My Introduction.

AM a native of Africa; but my parent ostrich having been hunted down for the property he carried with him, I was, many years ago, shipped at the Cape of Good Hope for London; in which magnificent city I have lived a life of many changes. In my time, I have tossed my head above the noblest in the land; and now—

But I will narrate my adventures in the order they befel me.

My duty to my parent demands that I should champion him against the supercilious sneers of the world—that I should vindicate his memory from the ignorant slander of mankind.

I will confess it, when after a race of some twenty leagues, with the horses close at my parent's tail, I beheld my honoured sire thrust his head into a bush, believing, as it was too plain he did, that because he could see nobody, nobody could see him,—I do confess, despite of filial love, I felt a fluttering of indignation, not unalloyed—may I be pardoned the sin!—with contempt. The world has taught me better wisdom. Experience has made me tolerant. Since I have seen men—praised, too, for their excelling prudence—commit the self-same folly as my unfortunate sire, reproach has subsided into sorrow, and content become softened by regret.

My Introduction.

But I come of an outraged, a slandered race. What bouncing fibs have been written of me, by sand-blind philosophers, and glibly repeated by gossips of all sorts at their firesides! How venerable does a lie become by length of years! Truth is never a babe, and never a hag. As at the first, so at the last: full-blown yet young; her eyes lustrous through ages, and her lip ruddy and fresh as with the dews of Eden; upon her brow sits an eternity of beauty. Now Falsehood is born a puling, roaring thing: its very infancy is anticipative of its old age, and stamped with the grossness of mortality. Day by day it waxes bigger and stronger; has increase of reputation, crowds of clients; until, at length, its unrighteous hoariness makes it worshipped by multitudes for no other reason save this—it has gray hairs. And so the wrinkled wizard keeps his court, and works his mischief-dealing paralysing spells, until Truth at some time turn her sapphire eyes full upon him, and as a bubble at a finger's touch, Falsehood is gone.

For thousands of years my ancestors have borne the weight of lies upon their backs. And first, for the shameless scandal that the family of ostriches wanted the love which even with the wasp makes big its parental heart towards its little ones.

“The ostrich, having laid her eggs, leaves them to be hatched by the heat of the sun.”

Such is the wickedness that for tens of centuries has passed among men for truth, reducing the ostrich to a level with those hollow-hearted children of Adam, who leave their little ones to the mercies of the world, to the dandling of chance, to the hard rearing of the poor-house. There is Lord de Bowelless; he has a rent-roll of thousands; is a plumed and jewelled peer. Look at him in his robes;—behold “law-maker” written on the broad tablet of his comprehensive brow. He is in the House of Peers: the born protector of his fellow-man. How the consciousness of high function sublimates his nature! He looks, and speaks, and lays his hand upon his breast, the invincible champion of all human suffering—all human truth. Turn a moment from the peer, and look at yonder biped. There is an old age of cunning cut and lined in the face of a mere youth. He has counted some nineteen summers, yet is his soul wrinkled with deceit. And wherefore? Poor wretch! His very birth brought upon her who bore him abuse and infamy: his first wail was to his mother’s ear the world’s audible reproach. He was shuffled off into the world, a thing anyway to be forgotten, lost, got rid of. In his very babyhood, he was no more to men than the young lizard that crawls upon a bank, and owes its nurture to the bounty of the elements. And so this hapless piece of human offal—this human ostrich deserted in its very shell—was hatched by wrong and accident into a thief, and there he stands, charged with the infamy of picking pockets. The world taught him nothing wise or virtuous, and now, most properly, will the world scourge him for his ignorance.

And thus, because man, and man alone, can with icy heart neglect his little ones—can leave them in the world’s sandy desert to crawl into life as best they may,—because a De Bowelless can suffer his natural baby to be swaddled in a workhouse, to eat the pap of pauper laws—to learn as it grows nothing but the readiest means of satisfying its physical instincts,—because his Lordship can let his own boy sneak, and wind, and filch through life, ending the life the father did him the deep wrong to bestow upon him, in deepest ignominy, because, forsooth, the human sire is capable of all this, he must, in the consciousness of his own depraved nature, libel the parental feelings of the affectionate ostrich! Oh, that the slander could perish and for ever! Oh, that I could pierce the lie to the heart; with a feather pierce it, though cased in the armour of forty centuries!

Again, the ostrich is libelled for his gluttony. Believe what is said of him, and you would not trust him even in the royal stables, lest he should devour the very shoes from the feet of the horses. Why, the ostrich ought to be taken as the one emblem of temperance. He lives and flourishes in the desert; his choicest food a bitter, spiky shrub, with a few stones—for how rarely can he find iron, how few the white days in which the poor ostrich can, in Arabia Petrea, have the luxury of a tenpenny nail?—to season, as with salt, his vegetable diet. And yet common councilman Prawns, with face purple as the purple grape, will call the ostrich—glutton!

For how many centuries did that stately rajah, the elephant, move about the earth, mankind all the while resolutely denying to him the natural joints of his legs? Poor fellow! although thousands and thousands of times he must have knelt before men—going upon his knees that his rider might tell the truth of him,—they nevertheless refused to him the power of bending. But the elephant has become a traveller—has condescended to eat cakes at a fair—has shown the combined humility and magnanimity of his nature, by going on his marrow-bones on the boards of a play-house, and the world has at length passed a truthful sentence upon him! At length the elephant has joints!

I have endeavoured, feebly enough I know, to vindicate the character of the maligned ostrich. Let that pass—my purpose in the following chapters is to tell what I have seen in my eventful, ever-shifting existence, as a feather, among men. An ostrich feather! Consider my mutations, and despise not my history.

—I—

My Arrival in England ;
My Visit to Shadrach Jacobs, of the Minories.

MY voyage from the Cape to the port of London

I would fain pass with the fewest words. I had at least this consolation—I was an unwilling traveller. Otherwise, I had deserved all the miseries of ship-board ; the darkness, the fetor, the hubbub and violence of the prison. I have some pity for anything that in its ignorance of salt-water first trusts itself to its mercies ; but none for the fool that ventures twice. There may be some Eden-like spots even in a coal-mine ; but the hold of a ship—ugh !

I remember being once present at a party of the Bishop of Spikenard's. The conversation turned upon the bountifulness of the sea, ordained, as it assuredly was, for the facile communication of man with man. Poor simpletons ! It is my inherent faith that the ocean was expressly created to keep nations as much as possible separate ; but that the courageous wickedness of man has set at nought the benevolent design of nature, and—to her astonishment—has triumphed in the very teeth of sea-sickness. Nay, have I not on my side the wisdom of law-makers ? For were they not of my faith, would they tax silks and pepper? On the contrary, would they not take to their bosoms the adventurous men who are tossed to and from the far East for rare commodities to clothe the limbs, and tickle the palates of their fellow-bipeds? And what is the fact? Why, legislation, as a check to the presumption of man, makes him—in a hundred different modes—pay for his temerity. The sea was intended to keep people to themselves; but the human heart is wicked, and men became ship-builders.

Let me here advise the reader of one of my besetting faults. I am now and then apt to give up the thread of a narrative, that I may run after some butterfly thought starting up before me: however, if the reader have patience, he will find that I always return to my story. If he have not, let him at once lay down the feathery tale before him. I am conscious of this infirmity of falling into idle chit-chat. Consider, however, the prejudices of my early education. Consider the time of life at which I was taken to court—consider the society amidst which I passed my whitest days, and you will pardon the small-talk of this my forlorn, ragged, mortified old age.

However, to begin the history of my adventures in merry England. I found myself the property of the third mate of the Jupiter, who had purchased me, with other of my companions, of a Kafir, for a twist of pig-tail; my new master rejoicing himself exceedingly at the cultivated intellect which enabled him to trick the savage. He never, I am certain, felt so much of an Englishman, as when he had fobbed the wild man. Jack Lipscomb, for so was my new master named, combined in his nature—at least, so he thought—all the courage and daring of the sailor, with the prudence and foresight of the experienced merchant. With this belief, he had the deepest contempt of every man of every nation, save of England. He believed that the blessings of arithmetic were wholly confined to his own beloved country and her darling sons; hence, in his small traffic with Chinese, Malay, and Hottentot, he would insist that two and two made seven, five and seven fifteen or twenty, as he might feel it convenient to arrange the figures. In a word, he considered every foreigner to be produced by benevolent nature for this one purpose—to bestow profit and pleasure on a freeborn Briton. It was this consciousness of superiority that made him vote himself “honest Jack Lipscomb—a man as was above a lie, and didn’t care who know’d it. He’d no deceit in him, not he: no

My Arrival in England.

—he never did nothing that he need hide from nobody." It was, doubtless, this fine principle that induced the ingenuous sailor to pack myself and some sixteen companions between his shirt and jacket ere he quitted the Docks. Doubtless, there was no need of such an arrangement, no other than the whim, the caprice of honest Jack Lipscomb.

On leaving the Docks, Jack took his way towards the Minories; and in a short time smote the hospitable door of an ancient Hebrew, known among his people as Shadrach Jacobs, and still more familiarly recognised by his intimates as "old Fluffy." Shadrach was a dealer in the pomps and vanities of life, turning the honest penny by such commodities, and still benevolently deploring their existence. He would employ an hour, persuading a poor wench that ear-rings of very questionable metal were of the purest ore, pocket the girl's quarter's wages for the small commercial deceit, and then sigh for the promised innocence, the pure felicity of the New Jerusalem. This was the tradesman who, for the past four voyages, had purchased the merchandise of honest, knowing Jack Lipscomb. "Vell! if it isn't Mr. Lipscomb—if I didn't dream on you last night—if I didn't dream you was come home, captain, don't never believe me, that's all!" Such was the salutation of the Hebrew dealer, as Jack stood revealed at the door-step. "This vay, Mr. Lipscomb—this vay;" and old Fluffy fluttered down the passage, and mounted the narrow staircase, shaking at least twenty years from his heels, with the expectation of sudden gain. Jack was speedily conducted into the Jew's room, crammed and littered as it was with exotic produce. Shells, feathers, birds, bamboo-sticks, Indian hammocks, war-swords, canoe-paddles, with half-a-dozen screaming parrots and macaws, enriched the commercial sanctuary of the Hebrew.

"If I didn't dream you was captain, Mr. Lipscomb!" repeated the Jew, as Jack dropt himself upon a chair.

"Captain!" cried Jack, affecting a contempt for such vain dignity.

"Vell, then, first mate," said the Jew, as though his dream comprehended even the second rank.

"Ugh!" cried Jack, "a pretty first mate we've got—yes, a good 'un, he is—just knows a bowsprit from a umbrella, and that's all."

"Bless me! vell!" sighed the Jew, and then smiling and rubbing his hands, he turned himself towards Jack, and with an affected look of anxiety, said, "In course, Mr. Lipscomb, you comes back second?"

"I tell you what, old Fluffy," said

The Story of a Feather.

Jack, stung by the feeling of unrewarded personal merit, "I tell you what—I'm just what I was—honest Jack Lipscomb—third mate of the Jupiter,—and I'd like you to show me a more straightforwader, honester fellow!"

"Ha! it would do good to my eyes to see him as could," said Shadrach; and then, in a tone of sympathy, "only third-mate—vell, this is a world, to be sure!" Having thus delivered himself, Mr. Jacobs proceeded to the first business of his life; namely, to business itself. He had thought it merely prudent to learn the condition of his old acquaintance, whether improved or not, since they last met. This, it must be owned on the part of the Jew, was really respectful to station in the abstract; for if Mr. Lipscomb were Captain Lipscomb, Mr. Jacobs, of course, knew too well what was due to rank to offer to a commander, or even to a first or second mate, that which in the trader's own opinion was merely due to the third. "Vell, and vot have you brought us, Jack?" asked the Jew, with the old familiarity of an old friend.

"In the first place," answered the sailor, "feathers;" and he produced myself and companions.

"Feathers,—vell, I don't know," mused the Jew, "as for feathers, Jack, they're down to nothin'. There's no vonder the world's vot it is, for feathers is quite gone out. Look at them shelves, there; look at them boxes—all full—not sold a feather this six months. I don't know vot's come to people. Some say it's edication—I don't know; if it is, it ought to be put down, for it makes the feather trade nothin'—nothin'—nothin'." Thus spoke the Jew, his voice deepening on each of the last three words, until he sounded what seemed the very bass-string of despair.

Indeed, the Jew and the sailor might have made a picture. Shadrach had, in his youth, rejoiced in luxuriant locks of more than golden: they were, in the intense signification of the phrase, red gold. These, in the storms of life, had become thickly specked with gray and white; yet remained there a departing ray among them to indicate the full glory that was past. Shadrach's face was lean and pointed; his eyes quick, and, as at times they seemed, trembling with excess of light—a light reflected as from guineas. His nose was boldly bowed, indicating the true son of Israel; and whilst the corners of his upper lip were twitched by muscular emotion—(how mysteriously is fashioned the civilised man, when there is a connexion between the seat of the pocket and the seat of the mouth!)—emotion, due homage to the spirit of gain, his under lip hung down, lapped over with the weight of sensibility, or sensuality, I will not decide. His sharp face, quick eye, faded yellow hair, and ardent complexion, gave him, to the eye of fancy, the visage of an old fox, grown venerably gray on the blood of stolen geese. And thus Shadrach sat and gazed at Jack Lipsecomb.

Miriam the Temptress. The Family-Watch.

HERE was a pause of some two or three minutes ; Jack Lipscomb fully apprehending the purpose of Shadrach Jacobs, yet at the same time feeling somewhat humiliated by the consciousness of his inferiority to the Jew. How had Jack in his innermost heart crowed and triumphed at the hard bargain which had made me his property ! With what profound contempt had he contemplated the intellectual degradation of the Kaffir who sold me, tricked, cheated, as the poor savage had been, by the mixed lying and bullying of the sailor. Such had been Jack's emotions ; but as he sat, and silently chewing, gazed at the Jew, he half-seemed to himself to change his condition with the barbarian he had gulled—he felt, in its fullest force, the supremacy of the Hebrew : he shrank beneath the influence of a subtler nature. Thus, Jack Lipscomb remained doggedly silent ; and thus the Jew was at length compelled to be a talker.

“ I tells you, Jack, feathers is nothin'. If, now, you've a little bag of gold-dust, or any nick-naek of that sort—vell, you hav'n't? Vell, vell, more's the pity, Jack—more's the pity, Mr. Lipscomb.”

“ Then we sha'n't deal, eh ? ” asked Jack sulkily, and throwing a significant glance towards the door. “ Well, there's Barney Aaron yet — that's one comfort.”

“ Vell, I didn't think it of you, Jack ; to threaten me with that serpent—that disgrace to the synagogue. Vot if feathers is a drug, do you think, Mr. Lipscomb, that I'd let you be robbed? Vy, I should think the roof would fall upon me if I let you go out of this house to be cheated."

I am Sold to the Jew.

"I don't know," said Jack, a little mollified—"perhaps you ar'n't the worst of the sharks."

"I vish I vos—yes, Mr. Lipscomb, I vish I vos," said the Jew, earnestly, "for then I shouldn't be the beggar vot I am. Ha! this is a vorld! Vell, vell, ve must take it as it is till the better one comes."

"In course," responded Jack, philosophically; and then counting my companions and myself before the Jew, he asked, "How much for the lot?"

"I don't know vot to do vith 'em," answered Shadrach, despondingly, looking down upon us and sighing deeply. "As I'm an honest man, I shall only keep 'em for the moths. Vot money have you in your pocket, Jack?"

"Something within hail of five pounds," replied the sailor.

"Vell, let me see,—vun, two, three,—yes, fourteen feathers—"

"Seventeen, you griffin," growled Jack.

"Vell, vell—I didn't see; ven you've looked upon the vickedness of the vorld as long as I have, Mr. Lipscomb, you'll have some feeling for an old man's eyes.

Let me see, six—no, yes—seventeen—vell, seventeen feathers, and you've got seven pound in your pocket?"

"Four pound, fifteen shillings," said Jack, in correction.

"Now shall I tell you vot I've long thought of, Mr. Lipscomb? I've often said to myself, vot a pity it vos that a man like you, Mr. Lipscomb, didn't think more of yourself: that you didn't show the face you ought to the vorld."

"What do you mean, Mr. Jacobs?" asked Jack, very seriously.

"Vy, you see," continued the Jew, in his blandest manner smiling upon the sailor—as an epicure smiles upon a dish he purposes very pleasantly to incorporate in his system—"vy you see, vot does it go for if you're the best sailor as ever swum—the honestest, goodlookingest young man as ever von the vink of a virtuous young voman—vot does all your goodness go for vith the vorld, if you don't vear a votch?"

Jack Lipscomb, with increasing gravity, sawed the back of his hand across his chin, and looking upon the floor, seemed as if the interrogative of the Jew had awakened a dormant feeling of vanity—had, in a moment, solved to his entire satisfaction a great social mystery. "I don't know if you arn't right," said Jack, after a pause.

"As the vorld goes—for it's made of wanity, Jack—a man's nothin' vithout a votch."

The Story of a Feather.

"There may be something in it," agreed the sailor.

"I'm an old man, my tear friend, and know the vorld vith all its crooked bits, and nasty blots, and I talk to you, Jack, like my own flesh and blood."

"Come, avast there!" exclaimed Jack, suddenly; "none o' that—I'm a Christian, and eats salt pork."

"To be sure, vy not?" answered the Jew, in no way disconcerted: he then returned to the charge. "I talk to you as I'd talk to my own son, and if it vos the last vords I had to speak, I'd say, Jack Lipscomb, do justice to yourself and get a votch."

"Advice is plentiful as sprats," said the sailor. "Any fool can say, get a watch; but he isn't such a fool, who shows how it's to be done."

"My tear friend," said the Jew, "vait a minute." Shadrach then unlocked a drawer, and taking from it a large, yellow, metal watch, exposed it, with a light laugh, to the sailor.

"It's a big un," said Jack Lipscomb, gravely.

"It's a beauty," exclaimed the Jew; "but you hasn't seen half, Jack, look here." Shadrach then wound up the watch, and the picture of a ship fixed in the dial-plate was set in motion, rocking very regularly over grass-green billows, under which was written the legend—"Such is life."

"She carries a good deal of canvas for such a sea," said the sailor glancing at the toy with a purely professional eye.

"To be sure—vonts nothin'," answered the Jew, casting his gleaming looks in the weather-beaten face of the doomed purchaser.

"Humph! I wonder how long them studding-sail booms would stand in a trough of the sea like that? They'd snap like clay-pipes; if they wouldn't I'm—"

"Never mind, my tear friend," cried the Jew quickly, "sixpence vill paint it out. Vell, vot do you say to that, Jack?" asked Shadrach, now holding the watch to the sailor's eyes, now withdrawing it, and now turning it in his hand, as though he held a magic mirror to dazzle and confound the beholder's senses. "Vot do you say to that, Jack?"

Jack spoke to the Jew's understanding a whole volume; albeit he really uttered not a word. For he slowly wiped his lips with the cuff of his jacket, the while he gazed at the chronometer; again he wiped away, what to the Jew seemed the water rising to the sailor's mouth, brought thither by strong desire of making that watch his own.

"For six pound with them feathers," and here the Jew threw an affected look of contempt upon myself and companions prostrate at his feet—"the votch shall be yourn."

"Is it gold?" asked Jack.

"Vot! vell!" exclaimed the Jew, and he advanced two indignant steps towards the drawer, as if about to consign the watch for ever to its keeping—then paused, and looking sorrowfully up into the face of Jack Lipscomb, asked him, in most pathetic tones, "vot he thought of him?"

"No offence, I hope," said Jack Lipscomb, deferentially.

"As if I'd sell my best friend anything but the best gold. Ha! Mr. Lipscomb, you don't know me—no, you don't; you've cut me clean to the heart; but to show you I bears no malice, I'll take all the money you have for the votch—"

"Without the feathers?" asked the sailor.

"No, my tear friend, with the feathers; though they're of no use to me—quite none: still, for principle, my tear friend, I must have the feathers."

Jack turned his tobacco in his mouth, looked at the watch, as the camelion fixes a fly, ere with its long thread of a tongue he consigns it to its jaws,—then, throwing forth his right hand, seized the timepiece, almost immediately emptying his pocket of four pounds, fifteen shillings.

"You've a bargain, Mr. Lipscomb—you've a—vell, bless my heart, don't go,"—said the Jew, as the knocker smote the street-door—"it's only an old acquaintance of yourn, my daughter Miriam."

Saying this the Jew quitted the chamber, and in two minutes from his departure, Miriam, a more than plump Jewess, with vast black eyes, a profusion of black hair (a very net for sailors' hearts), large rosy lips, showing every one of her brilliant white teeth, and her massive face polished over with smiles, swam into the room.

Poor Jack Lipscomb!

This may be a proper place to observe that a sentimental affection had, for the duration of three past voyages, grown up between Jack Lipscomb and Miriam Jacobs. If, however, it was not strictly between them, 'twas all the same—Jack thought it was. There was, unfortunately, what at first promised to be an inseparable bar to the happiness of matrimony—namely, the religion of Miriam; Jack sticking for it, most lustily, that his wife must be like himself, every inch a Christian.

The Story of a Feather.

"Ha! Miriam, what a pity it is you're a Jew!" This was wont to be the frequent complaint of the orthodox Jack; and at length Miriam, worked upon by her lover's affection—for sure we are his many presents had nothing to do with it—promised, after a fair exercise of thought on the subject, to give up the synagogue.

Miriam Jacobs and Jack Lipscomb are together. Shall I betray the language of lovers? I will not. I will content myself, and I trust, the reader too, by stating that Miriam (having seen the watch) promised to become a Christian wife in a week's time ; in token of which promise, she received the said watch as a gift of her expectant husband.

Jack Lipscomb, nothing the better for the alcohol sold in the Minories, quitted the house of Jacobs penniless, leaving me and my companions—whom he had all but stolen from a barbarian, only to be tricked in his turn—the property of the Jew.

Flamingo, the Court Feather-Merchant.

The Duke's Pine-Apple.

Birth of a Prince of Wales.

Y next remove was far westward. I became the property of the feather-merchant to the court; or, as the tradesman himself delighted to blazon in gold letters over his shop-door, "Plumasier to their Majesties." I confess I felt myself somewhat humiliated by the ill-report of Mr. Flamingo, who, in his dealing with Miriam Jacobs—on this occasion ambassadress from her sire in the Minories—protested that I was the inferior article of the whole lot; and that no pains of cleaning and dressing would ever enable me to return sixpence to my purchaser. This melancholy feeling, however, gave place to better hopes, when, on the departure of the Jewess—(Miriam had been compelled by the hard chaffering of the feather-merchant to throw a green monkey into the bargain, for the especial delectation of the youngest Miss Flamingo)—my new master selected me from my companions, and, shaking me tenderly, asked the wife of his bosom, "if I wasn't a perfect beauty?" This pleasing flattery was, moreover, adequately responded to by Mrs. Flamingo, who, with glistening eyes, declared me "quite a love."

I have already said, Mr. Flamingo was feather-seller to the court of Great Britain. He felt, intensely felt, the surpassing importance of his position. His very soul seemed plumed with the dignity. Hence, like my parent ostrich, he would, when full of the consciousness of his greatness, scarcely tread the shop-floor, but, raised upon the wings, or winglets, of his self-conceit, half-fly, half-walk. It was the religion of Peter Flamingo, that the whole moral and social condition of man depended solely upon feathers. Nay, I believe it to have been his inner creed that plumes were not so much designed for kings and nobles, as that potentates and peers were especially sent into this world for plumes. I say, inner creed; because my experience of mankind has convinced me that there are some people who have an outside faith covering a faith, in the same way that jugglers have a box within a box, the last in its small sanctuary generally containing the conjured shilling. When Peter Flamingo read or heard of the possible perfectibility of man, I am certain that man appeared to him like a Poland cock, with a natural crest of feathers. With this faith, it was consequent that Mr. Flamingo should pay profoundest reverence to those privileged to wear the artificial glory, such reverence being at the prime cost of those to whom fate had rigorously denied that proud advantage. Hence, the reader can imagine the separate places of the Marchioness of Mannaville, born to the right of a plumed coronet, and of Patty Butler, also born to the duty of dressing feathers—can conceive their separate conditions in the mind of Mr. Flamingo. The Marchioness was a creature apart, a glory to be numbered with the stars of heaven; the feather-dresser, a mere weed of earth, millions of miles away from that starry presence. Therefore, like a good penny-turning Chaldean, Flamingo thought, to properly worship the star, he must tread upon the weed.

Mr. Flamingo, in the observance of this faith, did at times forget the mere naked meaning of words, substituting another set of syllables for the only set rightly called for by the occasion. In home-spun phrase, Flamingo was a liar; but then his lies, since I must call them so, were used to the very best advantage. He dressed himself in falsehood, but then he looked all the better for it. He made positive gold-leaf of his untruths, which cast a lustre on him, covered, as he would still be covered, with borrowed radiance. Being feather-seller to the court, he was, of course, intimate with the whole peerage. He would, at a moment, cast you up the number of dimples to be found in the cheeks and chins of Countesses—would minutely describe to you the hangings and furniture of every best bedroom of every nobleman's mansion in the kingdom; he, in the course of his glorifying profession, having been an honoured guest thereat. With him true friendship was a flower that was only to be plucked from the gardens of the nobility; and this flower Flamingo was for ever twisting between his lips, or sporting in his button-hole. "My friend, the Marquis,"—"My most excellent friend, the Duke,"—"My worthy acquaintance, the Baronet." Thus continually spoke Flamingo ; and so speaking, he thought he let fall diamonds and rubies from his tongue for the world to wonder at.

The Story of a Feather.

A man with so many, and with such friends, had of course frequent evidences that friendship was not what the poetic cynic calls it, only "a name." By no means ; to Flamingo, it was sometimes a turbot—sometimes a turkey. His friend the Marquis would now and then appear upon the feather-dresser's table in the not less attractive, because twin shape of a brace of pheasants : his most excellent friend the Duke has smoked upon the board, in the solid beauty of a haunch of venison. Of all men in the world, Flamingo would have been the last to deprive the peerage of their proxies. More: how often did some exalted Dowager appear in a rich and candied preserve—how often some Earl's daughter, the last out of the season, sent a basket of peaches, ripe and tempting as her own lips? At least, if these gifts were really not made by the exalted people praised by Flamingo for their generosity, it was not the fault of the feather-dresser; no, the more his virtue to preach up the necessity of liberality to the world, even by apocryphal examples of beneficence.

It was some time after I had passed from the hands of the feather-merchant, that I heard a story illustrative of this, his theoretical virtue. As, however, I may not find a fitter place than the present for the story, I will here narrate it; the more especially as the occurrence took place whilst I was yet Flamingo's property, albeit then ignorant of the history I have to speak of.

Peter Flamingo gave a dinner. I should say he rather presided at a dinner given to him; for there was no dish upon the table that might not have borne above it the banner of the noble house from whence it emanated. Believe Flamingo, and the banquet was no other than a collection of offerings made to him by the English nobility: he could have pointed out the representatives of the peerage, from the noble who came to cut throats with William the Conqueror at Hastings, to the last baron ennobled for selling the throats of his constituents at Westminster. How Flamingo's guests—benevolently picked out by him from the very mob of tradesmen—wondered at the banquet; how they praised their host for his high connexions, and how they hated him!

The dinner passed off with excessive cordiality. The wine, every drop of it from the cellars of the peerage, made a passing call at the hearts of the drinkers, ere it mounted into their heads; and all was sincerity and noisy happiness.

The dessert appears. Were there ever seen such magnificent pine-apples? Flamingo drops his eye proudly yet lovingly upon the fruit, and says, with a soft voice, so modulated that not one man shall lose one syllable—"Ha! my dear Duke of Landsend—he is indeed a friend; all—all from his own gracious pinery."

"Bless my heart! Well, you are a lucky man!" cries Brown.

"Was there ever such a Duke in the world?" exclaims Johnson.

"It's a shame to put a knife into 'em;" remarks Field, directing his looks, sharpened to a very keen edge, towards the crown of the ducal gift.

"Pooh! pooh! what are pines grown for, if not to be eaten?" cries Flamingo, handling his knife, looking full at the pines, but only looking at them.

"Don't cut the Duke's gift—it's a shame! I wouldn't touch a bit of it," says Robinson; "but there's a couple of little ones there, that—"

"Well, if you prefer them—they're not so large; but their flavour is delicious! They were sent by—yes, I think by him—by Sir Harry Bargate, a baronet of the last batch: will you venture?" And without waiting for a reply, Flamingo cuts into very, very small pieces the smallest pine.

And still all proceeds with increasing felicity. The bottle goes round and round, and at length the heads of the drinkers begin obediently to follow it. The laugh increases—the shout swells—and all is boisterous merriment.

Brown jumps to his legs. "It's no use," he cries; "I've fought against it long enough: I must have a cut at the Duke." So saying, Brown seizes the largest pine, and with furious precipitancy, strikes his knife into it; Flamingo's blood running cold to his very toes.

"And so must I!" cries the no less drunken Johnson, following Brown's example.

"And I!" screams Field; and the third knife enters the Duke's third pine.

"And I, too," shouts Robinson, rising to commit execution; but Flamingo, restored by the third attack to something like consciousness, snatches up the pine, and Robinson, missing his mark, falls sprawling on the table.

The charm of the night is broken; Flamingo looks sulky: and the guests, a little sobered by a sense of their attack upon the Duke's gifts, depart.

"We were wrong," says Brown, "to demolish those pines; for, if Flamingo had had to buy 'em what would they have cost?"

"I wonder what's the market-price now?" says Johnson — "let's ask." And as he spoke, he turned into a celebrated fruiterer's. "What's the price of those pines?"

"Three guineas each, sir," answered the tradesman.

"They're very small," said Johnson. "Have you none bigger?"

"Yes, four—very large; five guineas each. But I can't show them now; for the fact is, they're out on hire for a night to my neighbour, Mr. Flamingo."

And so, the Duke of Landsend was the shopkeeper ; and so Flamingo paid fifteen guineas (he saved one pine) for a lie, certainly, if there be any means of testing the value of lies, not worth half the money.

Birth of a Prince of Wales.

This little banquet took place on the 11th of August, 1762. With much melancholy did Peter Flamingo rise on the 12th. His bile, however, was blown away by the Park guns, for they announced the birth of Queen Charlotte's first-born—the Prince of Wales.

The “rudiments of an angel”* were begun in George the Fourth. Did Peter Flamingo rejoice at the birth of a Prince of Wales? I think so ; but certain I am his heart rejoiced at the fine prospect for feathers.

* In The Yorkshireman of Jan. 14, 1843, is the report of a meeting of “The Stockton Mechanics' Institute,” William Bayley, Esq., in the chair. The Chairman, in introducing the Prince of Wales and Princes Royal, said—“Reverence in the son the future man, and in the prince the future king. Destroy not in either royal scion the rudiments of an angel.”

IV

Patty Butler, the Feather-Dresser.

Patty's Mother. Mr. Lintley, the Apothecary.

HE week that followed the 12th of August, 1762, was a time of jubilee for rejoicing, thoughtful England. A Prince of Wales was born; and as I heard, numberless patriotic sages had, at public dinners, already prophesied in him another Alfred. In his time all the virtues would walk the highways, dropping flowers in the every-day paths of mortals, and rejoicing plenty unloose her golden sheaves for the no more repining poor. The sky would wear a purser azure—the gladdening sun once more beam with the sanctifying light it cast on Eden—the whole earth lie nearer Paradise, and once more as men were wont to talk with one another. The Prince—it was predicted from the tables of a thousand taverns—would be the paragon of mortals; in his own great acts indicating to the highest the divine origin and end of man, and showing the folly, the littleness, of all human malice, and all human selfishness. George the Fourth yet slept in his cradle, when the spirit of prophecy thus walked abroad, and played the sweetest notes upon its silver trumpet; and tailors and gold lacemen felt a strange, mysterious gladness—a lightening of the heart and pleasant spasm of the pocket.

Patty Butler dwelt in a long, dark lane, on the north side of the Strand; in one of those noisome, pestilent retreats abutting on, yet hidden by, the wealth and splendour of the metropolis: one of the thousand social blotches covered by the magnificent trappings of London. Even to this place did the birth of the Prince of Wales bring gladness: for Patty Butler smiled, as dreaming grief might smile in an angel, as Luke Knuckle, Mr. Flamingo's light-porter, somewhat suddenly stood before her.

"Hush!" said Patty, advancing to him, with upraised finger.

"How's mother?" asked Luke, with a quiet earnestness.

"Better—better, Luke, and asleep. Have you brought work?" inquired the girl with trembling voice, and the tears almost in her eyes.

"Hav'n't you heard the news?" asked Flamingo's porter.

"What news should I hear in this place?" said Patty.

"Why, to be sure, you might as well be clean out of the world. Not to have heard all about it! Well, I wouldn't ha' believed it! Can't you guess?" Patty with a wan smile shook her head. "Well then," said Luke, "not to tease you any longer—for God help you! poor babe, you've enough trouble for any six—what do you think?—there's a Prince of Wales born."

"Indeed?" said Patty, unmoved by the blissful intelligence.

"Why, where could you ha' been not to have heard the bells ringing, and the guns—to be sure, this isn't much of a place for merry bells to be heard in at all—but where could you ha' been?"

"Where could I have been—where could I go?" said Patty a little impatiently—and then forcing a smile to her fading lips, she asked—"and what, Luke, can a Prince matter to folks like us?"

"Well!—why you used to be a quick girl—don't you see, the Prince of Wales as is come will make the fortin' of feathers? It's what they call one of his royal prerogatives—though, for myself, I can't say I know what they quite are. I know this much, though; old Flamingo's all upon the wing agin. There's work for three months certain," added Luke.

Patty clasped her hands in thankfulness.

"Master said you must come to the shop and work, or go without it; but I talked to missus—ha! she'd ha' been a nicer woman after all, if luck hadn't given her such good board and lodging,—I told her how ill your mother was—how you'd starve beside her, but wouldn't leave her; so I got her to abuse master into a bit of goodness, and so that you mayn't leave mother, I've brought the work to you." Here the honest porter displayed myself and others to Patty Butler.

The Story of a Feather.

"You are always so good-natured, Luke," cried Patty.

"I don't know about that," said Knuckle ; "but after all, it seems to me so easy to be good-natured, I wonder anybody takes the trouble to be anything else. Good bye, Patty : I say, the work must be done directly—for master says he don't know when it won't be wanted."

"I won't stir, Luke, till I've finished it, that you may be sure of," said Patty, with new cheerfulness ; and wishing her a cordial farewell, and speedy health to her mother, Luke Knuckle—the light-porter to Flamingo, the court feather-merchant—descended the dark narrow staircase with the feeling of the finest gentleman ; for he trod gently, anxiously, lest he should wake the sleeping sick.

Released from the case, I could now look about me. I am sure I felt a thrill of pain as the place broke upon me. An August sun struggled through a narrow lattice, as though stained and tainted by the gloom it had to pierce ; dimly showing the space of the apartment, a space not encumbered by useless furniture. In a recess, a nook of the room, was a bed : and I could hear the hard breathing of a sleeper—but only hear ; for a curtain of surprising whiteness hung between us. Indeed, every object was wonderfully clean, and displayed itself in contrast to the meanness of the material. All was penury, but penury in housewife attire.

Patty Butler took me from my other companions, looking earnestly at me. I have seen eyes exulting under coronets ; have felt throughout my frame the magic breath of beauty, born with all earth's pleasures for its handmaids ; have waved above and touched the velvet cheek of lady greatness : yet have I never felt such deep emotion as when gazed upon by the poor feather-dresser—the girl of fifteen years—the drudge of a garret in a pestilent and fever-breathing alley.

Patty would never have been beautiful ; born in down, and fed upon the world's honey-dew, she would have passed for nothing handsome ; but she had in her countenance that kind of plainness, to my mind, better than any beauty heaven has yet fashioned. Her sweet, gentle, thin face trembled with sensibility—with sensibility that sent its riches to her eyes, glittering for a moment there, beyond all worth of diamonds. I have said, she was really but fifteen ; she would have passed for twenty. From earliest childhood, she was made to read the hardest words—want, poverty—in the iron book of daily life ; and the early teaching had given to her face a look of years beyond her age. With her, daily misery had anticipated time.

And she sits, in that almost empty garret, a lovely sacred thing—a creature that redeems the evils and the wrongs of earth ; and in her quiet suffering—in her devotion, constant to her heart as her heart's blood—gives best assurance of a future heaven. She sits, glorified by patient poverty—by the sustaining meekness of her soul, by the unconquerable strength of her affections. Beautiful are queens on thrones—but is there not a beauty (eternal as the beauty of the stars!) in placid want, smiling with angel looks, and gathering holiest power, even from the misery that consumes it ?

The Story of a Feather.

For two nights, Patty scarcely took one constant hour's repose. Still she worked; her labour only intermitted by her frequent visits to the bed-side where lay her sick mother. I have seen the feet of the best opera-dancers; heard them praised for their life, ay, for their intelligence—their sentiment. Yet have I seen nothing like Patty Butler's foot, touching the garret floor from her chair to the bed-side; so gentle, so affectionate, so noiseless, lest she should wake her mother.

Each day, the doctor—not the parish doctor—came. A neighbour had told him of the sick woman; and he had accidentally seen the gentle Patty. Mr. Lintley was a poor apothecary. It was at times a hard struggle for him not to tell the man who called for the taxes,—to call again. He had no hope of a shilling from Mrs. Butler, even could his skill restore her; but more—he knew the seal of death was on her; consumption—Patty knew it not—withered her.

The third day I passed in the garret, the doctor paid his morning visit. Patty had been up all night: that night she had wept—bitterly wept—had risen every five minutes to hover about her mother, who would still assure her she was better—much better.

Mr. Lintley, the apothecary, entered the garret. What chaplets are woven for men of slaughter! What statues erected to men-slaying conquerors! What notes of glory sounded—what blaspheming praises to the genius of blood-shedding! I have seen much of the ceremonies dedicated to these things, and contrasting my late feelings with my present, with what new homage do I venerate the race of Lintleys—the men who, like minor deities, walk the earth—and in the homes of poverty, where sickness falls with doubly heavy hand, fight the disease beside the poor man's bed, their only fee the blessing of the poor! Mars may have his planet, but give me—what in the spirit of the old mythology might be made a star in heaven—the night-lamp of apothecary Lintley.

“And how—how is your mother?” asked the apothecary, shown into the room by Patty, who, with me in her hand, had risen to open the door.

“She is better, sir,” said Patty—“better and asleep.”

The apothecary looked with a mild sadness on the girl, and drew aside the curtain. Her mother was dead.

In tears and agony and numbness of heart, and death about me, I was prepared—“drest” for—

Patty Butler Finishes her Work. A Ruffian.

A Word on London Garrets. Patty in the Watch-House.

PATTY'S loss of her mother was quickly known; and as quickly was the chamber of death filled with poor neighbours—the needy, suffering, squalid, ay, and even vicious denizens of that miserable, fetid alley. Touched by sympathy, in the very fulness of heart, utter destitution proffered service and assistance to the motherless girl—when its only aid was a comforting look; its only means, the starting tear: nature, forgetful of its worldly destitution, spoke only from the abundance of its pity. Old, care-lined faces—with the ugliness of habitual want sharpening and deforming them—looked kind and gentle, for the time refined and humanised by the awakened spirit of human love. These pressed about the sufferer, and with trite words of comfort—with old and common phrases of compassion—(the best rhetoric the talkers had to offer)—tried to soothe the stricken girl. “God help her!” cried an old crone, with melting looks, though with the features of a sibyl. “God will help her!” cried a young creature, sobbing, whilst the tears ran down her cheeks, washing from them the branding rouge that set apart the speaker. So earnest was the voice that Patty raised her head from her hands, and her eyes meeting the eyes of her girl neighbour—of the poor, reckless thing, often so heedless and laughing in her very despair; of her, who a hundred times when passing in the lane, by venom words and brassy looks, had taunted and out-stared the simple, gentle feather-dresser—Patty felt a communion of heart in the deep sincerity of that assurance of God's help, and through her tears smiled dimly, yet thankfully, affectionately on her comforter. The blighted girl, thus recognised, was about to seize Patty to her arms with the folding of a sister : she then shrunk back as at a ghost, and, as though poison had suddenly shot through all her veins, trembled from head to foot, whilst the paleness of death rose beneath the paint, in ghastly contrast of mortality and shame. With a half-suppressed moan, the girl darted down stairs, and rushed to her only place of refuge—the horrid street.

Happily, the kindness of Mr. Lintley, the apothecary, rendered the assistance of the neighbours—could they have offered any beyond the kindness of mere words—needless. Lintley was doomed to, perhaps, the most penal condition of poverty ; that is, to an outside show of comfort, with that gnawing, snapping fox, penury, eating to the bowels within ; was one of the thousand grown-up Spartans who, with aching hearts and over-jaded faculties, turn a shining outside look on London streets. Nevertheless, Lintley determined that Patty's mother should not go to the earth in workhouse deals ; for though his philosophy smiled at the vanities of the undertaker, it had still, in its very elevation, the better part of philosophy, a benign and charitable consideration for the weakness, the prejudice, yea, for the folly of others. Thus, all things necessary for that last scene of life—in which the man, though dead, still plays a part—were duly ordered at the charge of Mr. Lintley, and—how few the hours !—Patty sat and worked beside her coffined mother.

"Now, child—do come down stairs—do, now : you'll be comfortable there," urged an old woman, a lodger, to Patty, seeking to win her from the place of death.

"Thank you, I am better here—happier—indeed I am," said Patty, with sweetest meekness.

"Well, but it's getting late and dark," said the woman, "and ain't you afraid ?"

"Afraid ! Of what should I be afraid ?" asked the girl.

"Well, to be sure, for a young thing you've a bold heart ; but when I was a girl, I could have no more stayed alone with anybody dead—"

"Not if you loved them ?" interrupted Patty.

"Why, love's something, to be sure ; but still death, my dear, you know—"

"Takes fear from love, and as I feel it, makes love stronger. I loved her when she was here, and must I not love her—still more love her—now she is an angel? I tell you, it comforts me to be alone—it does indeed,” said Patty.

A Word on London Garrets.

“Well, to be sure! if ever! who could have thought!” and the old woman would have proceeded in her exclamations.

“But if you’ll be kind enough to stay here till I come back from Mr. Flamingo—”

“To be sure; Mrs. Shroudly and me will stay,” said the woman.

“You will so serve me! In half-an-hour I shall have finished my work; I shall soon be back.”

“And you’ll sleep here alone in this room to-night?” asked the visitor.

For a moment Patty could not speak: then, with a torrent of tears, and a voice of anguish, she answered—“It is the last, it is the last!”

The well-meaning neighbour left the room, and by the last light of a golden August evening, Patty completed her task. Her work was done; and the room darkened, darkened about her. She sat fearless, self-sustained in the gloom; her thoughts made solemn and strengthened by the atmosphere of death which fell upon her spirit. She felt as in a holy presence. That poor, weak, ignorant creature—in the exaltation of her soul, communed with her mother in the skies; talked, wept, prayed to her, and was comforted. And for that which lay apart—for that mute, dull semblance of the thing that was—it was for a time forgotten in the rapturous grief that sorrowed at its loss. Thus passed the girl an hour of darkness, made bright by spiritual dreams; and then, calm and sustained, she prepared to venture in the roaring street.

Unseen, unknown, are the divinities that—descending from garrets—tread the loud, foul, sordid, crowding high-ways of London. Spiritual presences, suffering all things, and in the injustice—most hard to turn to right—of our social purpose, living and smiling, daily martyrs to their creed of good. Young children, widowed age, and withered singleness—the ardent student, flushed and fed with little else but hope—the disappointed, yet brave, good old man, a long, long loser in the worldly fight, who has retired apart, to bleed unseen, and uncomplaining die—the poor and stern man, only stern in truth—sour of speech, with heart of honied sweetness,—all of these, in all their thousand shades of character and spirit—the army of martyrs to fortune, and the social iniquities that, drest and spangled for truths, man passes off on man—all of this bright band have, and do, and will consecrate the garrets of London, and make a holy thing of poverty by the sacrificial spirit with which they glorify her. Many of these are to be known—but more escape the searching eyes of the quickest moral vision. There is a something—a look of service in the aspect of some; a depression that elevates, a dogged air of courage that speaks the fighting man in poverty's battalions—an honourable, undisguised thread-bareness that marks the old campaigner! Are not his darns more beautiful than best work of Sidonian needles—is there a patch about him that is not, duly assayed, true cloth of gold? And has not such poverty its geni, its attending spirits? Yes; a bloodless glory is its body-guard, and its tatter-bearer an angel.

And does not some such presence walk with Patty Butler down the Strand, on to the house of Peter Flamingo, feather-merchant to the Court? Stay: who is it, that now addresses her?

There is a tall creature hanging about her steps—now, shifting to the right side, now the left; now behind and now before. And now he inclines himself, and says something to the ear of Patty, who—with her thoughts in that room of misery and desolation—cannot heed him, but with her heart in her throat, walks quicker and quicker, silent and choking.

“If you hav’n’t a tongue, I’ll see if you’ve lips,” exclaimed,—not the good angel of Patty Butler,—and the speaker threw his arms about the girl, who shrieked with misery and terror. Ere, however, the sound had died upon his ear, the ruffian had measured his length upon King George the Third’s highway.

Luke Knuckle, Mr. Flamingo’s porter, had been sent to Patty to hurry her with her work. Arriving at the house but two or three minutes after her departure, he had followed closely on her steps, and was thus in a most advantageous situation for the proper application of his fist, at a most dramatic point of time.

“Watch! watch!” roared the fellow, still upon his back; for with evidently a quick sense of the magnanimity of Britons, he felt the only means of escaping a second blow was to use nothing but his lungs.

“What’s the matter?” asked a watchman, who miraculously happened to be near the spot.

“I’m robbed,” was the answer.

“Robbed!” and the watchman whirled his rattle.

“Robbed,” was the lie repeated; “and I desire you to take to the watch-house that pickpocket”—and the speaker pointed to Knuckle—“and that—” but the word was lost in the noise of a newly sprung rattle.

The watchmen gathered together, and Patty Butler, with her honest champion, was taken to the watch-house of St. Martin-in-the-Fields.

VI

Patty Butler in the Watch-House.

The Charge. Her Release.

“WHAT’S the charge?” asked Mr. Naplightly, night-constable of the parish of St. Martin-in-the-Fields.

“Picking pockets,” replied one of the watchmen, trippingly.

“Ha! I see—yes, an old friend, eh, watchman?” said Naplightly, looking with terrible significance at the little feather-dresser, pale, trembling, and dumfounded by the suddenness of the event that had placed her in the foul, dim dungeon, where justice, for a time laying aside a half-smoked pipe, was to decide upon the accusation.

“You know this young lady, of course?” asked the constable.

“Bless your heart, sir,—know her! Do I know my own rattle? The most troublesome and abusingest girl on my beat,” answered the watchman.

“That’s plain enough—plain with half an eye. Now, sir, if you please”—and the night-constable looked towards the tall man, the assailant of Patty. “Now, sir, everything according to business. What’s your name?”

“Julius Curlwell,” answered the ruffian, looking loftily around him, as though very proud of his name, and pulling up his manifold white neck-cloth, as if still prouder of the cambric.

“And where do you live, and what are you?” asked the functionary.

“I at present reside,” answered Mr. Curlwell, with monosyllabic majesty, “with my friend, my lord Hunting-topper.”

Patty in the Watch-House.

before arched with dignity—relaxed into a courteous smirk, and he felt his voice grow mellow in his throat: the watchmen too drew themselves up, glancing respectfully at Lord Huntingtopper's friend, who, doubtless, unconscious of the impression he had made, jerked with languid, lackadaisical air his heavy gold chain and seals between his right thumb and finger.

"And you charge this young girl, Mr. Curlwell, with picking your pocket?—you—"

Here the constable was interrupted, as he called it, by Patty; for she fell in a heap upon the watch-house floor, as though stabbed to the heart. In an instant, Knuckle raised her in his arms, and removing her bonnet, the yellow light of a flaring lamp fell upon her death-pale, innocent face; and a tear rolled down her white cheek on the rough hand of Luke, who, as though molten lead had dropt upon his flesh, started round, and with a look of pain and passion glared now at the constable, and now at Mr. Julius Curlwell. "You stoney-hearted vipers," cried Luke at last,—“will you let the poor girl die—will none of you get some water?”

"Yes, it's all right," muttered one watchman, leering and laughing, "when the evidence is strong, they always tries a faint."

Worn out, exhausted by the anguish of the previous days,—oppressed with that feeling of desolation which makes the world far worse than valueless,—terrified, astounded by her situation—Patty had remained in a half-stupor—her mind and senses numbed by the apathy of misery. The words of the constable for a moment called her back to consciousness, and then she sank beneath the torture.

"There—she'll do, with a little water," jested one of the watchmen, as Luke sprinkled Patty's face—"and if she won't I'm sorry for her; seeing as the parish finds no hartshorn. I told you she'd do," repeated the fellow, as Patty unclosed her eyes, and, breathing heavily, looked mournfully about her.

"Oh, Luke!" she exclaimed at length, bursting into tears, as the implied accusation of the constable flashed upon her. "Oh, Luke!"

"Silence!" cried the night-officer, knitting his brows; and then turning to the injured man—Lord Huntingtopper's friend—he broke into a grim smile, saying, "Now, sir, if you please? Come to the robbery." Again Patty moaned, and again the night-constable roared "Silence!"

"I—I—I can't precisely make a—a what you call—a criminal charge against that young woman in particular—no, understand me—not in particular—certainly not—nevertheless, I have been robbed—a very handsome family snuff-box—robbed and knocked down—or knocked down and robbed; for understand me, I wish to be exact; a very handsome, gold-mounted, tortoiseshell box—couldn't go without fingers—with family crest—dolphin with tail in his month, Latin under it, and everything proper." Such was what Mr. Julius Curlwell evidently considered to be his charge.

The Story of a Feather.

The night-constable indulged in a heavy shake of the head, and glancing at Patty, observed, "If things of this sort isn't put down by the strong hand, there's an end of respectability. I think there's evidence enough to lock the girl up till the morning."

"Oh, for the love of mercy!" shrieked Patty; and then, convulsed and heart-stricken, she could speak no more; but held forth her clasped hands to the night-constable.

"Stop—stop!" cried the officer, as Luke was about to speak; "let us do everything in order; first search the girl; the property may be about her." Patty looked entreatingly at the constable, who waved his hand as though his public virtue were proof against looks. She then turned with streaming eyes to Mr. Curlwell, who, with a slight cough, and averting his face from the glance of the accused, somewhat hurriedly drew his handkerchief from his pocket, and with considerable energy, blew his nose.

"But to begin with—watchman, what's that?" asked the constable, pointing to the case, where reposed myself and companions: "what's that?"

"My work, sir,—it is, indeed; I was going to take it home," said Patty, "when that gentleman"—her voice faltered—"when that gentleman—Oh, God help me!"—she could say no more.

"Ha!" and the night-constable breathed hard, sucked his underlip, and then said, speaking as an oracle—"The thing looks very black agin her. Watchman," and he raised his voice, "what's in that case?"

Immediately the watchman drew me from my companions, and with a look of admiration that ought to have pleased me, cried, "Well! what a bit o' snow!"

"Young woman," said the night-constable—he also smitten with my beauty; "Young woman, I do hope these things are honestly come by; I say, I do, as a father, hope it," he repeated, with a manner that proved he had no hope whatever on the subject.

"Honestly come by—to be sure they are—as I'd show you in five minutes if

The Charge.

I was only out of this dog-hole," cried Luke.

"By the bye," said the night-constable, at length really awakened to the presence of Knuckle—"what is the charge against this man? What is your charge, sir?"

I cannot exactly say what it was that prompted the answer to Mr. Julius Curlwell, but that person having placed his hand in his coat side-pocket, raised his eyelids with a slight motion of astonishment, and replied in the softest voice—"Charge! none whatever."

"I thought you was knocked down, sir, and—"

"Unquestionably; but I wish to be particular, and—no, I wouldn't make a mistake for the world—and I—that is, against the man—I have no charge whatever."

"You may go," said the night-constable, adding, with a leer, "and you may thank this noble gentleman for his good-nature."

Luke evidently deemed such politeness unnecessary, for taking no notice of Curlwell, and saying in a hurried whisper to Patty, "Just you wait a minute," he impatiently made his way from the watch-house.

"Upon second thoughts," said Mr. Curlwell, "I do think, Mr. Night-Constable, you had better let the girl go too; she may amend—she may reform—and for my part, I pardon her—I do, indeed; so, you'd better let her go."

Mr. Naplightly, the constable, certainly felt desirous of entertaining the humane idea suggested by Mr. Julius Curlwell, but as that philanthropist did not back his arguments by other reasons, very current in the good old days or nights of the good old roundhouse, Mr. Naplightly relapsed into official virtue, and said he would certainly lock the girl up till the morrow morning.

Here Patty entreated the constable to wait the return of Luke; he would be back immediately. Mr. Curlwell also joined in the request, adding that as the night was very hot, and the watch-house not particularly well ventilated, he would wait outside until he saw better reason either to forego or press his charge. Here Mr. Curlwell slipped a crown into the hand of a watchman, and the lock of the door was turned, Mr. Curlwell sagaciously observing, as he stepped into the moonlight, that "there was nothing so sweet as fresh air."

And yet there was another sweetness which Mr. Curlwell lost no time ere he enjoyed; for he drew from his side-pocket the tortoiseshell gold-mounted snuff-box—the box, bearing the dolphin with its tail in its mouth, the Latin under it, and everything proper—the box he had deemed lost in the mob that had gathered round him on his prostration ; but which happily he had found whilst in the watch-house, though being on certain occasions what is called a close man, he did not then make known the discovery.

The Story of a Feather.

To return to Patty in the watch-house. She is not thrust into the den in which half-a-dozen wretched creatures have been screaming and shouting, but is permitted a seat among the watch-men, who, leaving his Majesty's subjects to the influence of their own impulses, good or bad, sit at the hearth and drink porter, the while they admire myself and fellows.

Her Release.

"I say, Barney," cries an old guard-ian, sticking me in his greasy hatband, and straddling about the floor; "here's a thing to go a courtin' in!"

The shout excited by this magic touch of humour was checked by violent knocking at the watch-house door. It was no sooner opened, than Luke Knuckle, Mr. Flamingo the feather-merchant, and—though not too will-ingly—Mr. Curlwell, entered.

Mr. Flamingo, seeing me, turned pale at the desecration, and tremblingly asked the watchman how he dared to pollute his property.

The night-constable was now satisfied—Patty's story was true, and if she would only ask Mr. Curlwell's pardon for having accosted him in the street, she might go about her business.

"Never!" exclaimed Patty, her face reddening to scarlet.

It so happened that Curlwell—the faithful valet of Lord Huntingtopper—had no intention to appear again in the watch-house, but had unhappily met his acquaintance, the feather-merchant, on his way thither, accompanied by Knuckle, who had compelled him to return. Being brought back, he felt he was obliged to appear the injured person.

"Bless my soul!" said Flamingo, in a half-whisper to the valet—"and that creature addressed you in the street! How Mrs. Flamingo's deceived in her! This is the last bit of work she does for us." Then turning to the night-con- stable, he exclaimed,—“If she won't ask the gentleman's pardon, lock her up.”

Patty thought of her home—poor, stricken creature, what a home!—of the last night she was to pass beneath a roof with her dead mother; and with this thought in her face, her eyes, her voice,—she approached Curlwell, and in a tone that must have made him soul- sick, said—

"I ask your pardon, sir."

Patty returns Home.      Unexpected Visitor.

WHEN Mr. Flamingo had fairly crossed the threshold of the round-house he paused, and throwing as much solemnity as lay in his power into his figure, voice, and manner, asked of Patty, "What she thought would become of her?"

Poor girl! that thought was then busy at her heart—that thought then bewildered her: she answered not a word—but sobbed bitterly.

"See what it is to have fallen into the hands of a Christian," continued the feather-merchant. "If Mr. Curlwell had only pressed his charge,"— that worthy person being too modest to listen to his praises, had walked quickly on—"what, what could have saved you from oakum and Bridewell? If you're not quite lost to shame and goodness, you'll pray for that good man."

"Pray for him!" cried Knuckle. "Well, master, if you don't make the flesh shake upon one's bones—I tell you, as I've told you before, it was the old fellow himself who insulted the child—it was."

"Silence, sir—silence! That shocking habit you have of speaking against your betters will some day take you to Tyburn. Don't I know the gentleman well? A man with money in the Bank! A man in the confidence of one of my best customers! A man with such a fatherly look—wears powder, and everything respectable! Is it likely, eh?" asked the feather-merchant, with an invincible air. "As for you,"—and Flamingo turned to Patty—"as a Christian, I hope you'll not want bread; but—no!—I owe it to Mrs. Flamingo—I owe it to the vir-tuous young people about me—you never eat another crumb of mine.”

“I did nothing, sir—I said nothing—indeed, sir—I—oh, sir!—you don’t know what I’ve suffered.”—Patty could stammer out no more.

“Suffered! And what have I suffered? Is it nothing to have one’s property flaunted about in a round-house? Gracious me! if the world knew what had happened to these feathers, where would be my reputation—and more, where would be my connexion? The feathers now,” said Flamingo, “ar’n’t worth a groat.”

“Well, if they have been tumbled a little,” urged Knuckle, “can’t Patty put ’em all to-rights again?”

“Yes, indeed, sir,” cried Patty, earnestly—“indeed I will—I’ll not sleep first.”

“Humph!” said Flamingo, “and now how do I know that the property will be safe?” Patty spoke not a word; but she looked in the face of Flamingo—in his swollen, prosperous face—and the look made his eye blink, and his lip work: he violently rubbed his chin, and said hurriedly, “Well, well, I hope after all, that you are honest; and so, under the circumstances—I’ve no doubt I’m setting a bad example—still, under the circumstances,” (it was thus delicately Flamingo touched upon the death of Patty’s mother,) “I’ll bring myself to trust you. Now, go home; say your prayers, be a good girl, and particularly mind that I have the feathers to-morrow. Luke, I want you—quick.”

Saying this, Mr. Flamingo walked towards his westward habitation. Now, the feather-merchant was, when all is said, not really so coarse and selfish as his words and manner proclaimed him. He did not credit all the story told, or rather cunningly hinted, by Curlwell, of Patty; nevertheless he would not trust himself to disbelieve Lord Huntingtopper’s valet: he was so respectable, so well-placed, and more, he was in the establishment of a nobleman, whose lady had such a laudable love of feathers! Therefore, Flamingo suffered his belief to be nicely balanced between the valet and the girl; both might be right—both might be wrong. Flamingo was, however, one of those politic folks, who think the surest way to make people, that is, people depending upon them, better than they are, is to treat them as if they were infinitely worse. A workman had only to commit some heinous fault, and so entirely forfeit the confidence of his master, to learn for the first time what an estimable person the feather-merchant had once thought him! A man had only to become a thief, to make Flamingo earnestly declare that "he would have trusted that man with untold gold." Such trust, however, it had never been his weakness to put in the human animal.

Knuckle, having said a few hurried words of comfort to Patty, followed his master. Patty, then, with quickened steps, turned towards her home. Yes, with lightened heart, she almost ran along the street, gliding and shrinking from every passer-by, as though dreading some new impediment, some terrible delay, to keep her from a hearth, where death alone remained to greet her. So happy, so strangely happy was she at her escape from the den she had quitted, so relieved from the paralysing dread that the last, last consolation would have been denied her, that, in her assurance of liberty, she seemed to lose a conviction of that irreparable misery at home: she ran once more to find her mother; hardly for the time remembering that that mother had passed away for ever.

The bell of St. Martin's tolls two, and Patty, with swollen eyes and anxious, bloodless face, is working alone. She is sewing some piece of dress, a mourning garment, a piece of decent outside black, purchased by the sacrifice of almost all necessary apparel —of the very bed covering, for which in the coming winter nights she may starve with winter cold—she is working, mechanically working, her face dead, blank with misery, her fingers only moving.

(What a hideous vanity may leer from out the ornamental mourning of the rich—what elaborate mockery of woe in gauze and flounce, bought over fashion's counter!—but what a misery on the misery of death—what sacrifice upon suffering in the black of the poor, bought with money lent—that is, sold—by the money-broker!)

The church bell had scarcely ceased to sound, when a low, distinct knock struck on the door; again, and again, yet Patty heard it not; but continued at her work, absorbed and unconscious. The door opened, and a female, silently as a shadow, glided in.

"Patty, Patty," said the visitor.

Patty lifted up her head, was about to shriek, when, by a violent effort, she subdued her emotion, and, laying down her work and rising from her chair, she asked, with trembling voice—"In the name of God, who, what are you?"

"Do you not know me, Patty?" said the woman, with a slight shudder.

"Can it be Jessy?" cried Patty.

"It is that wretch; though God bless you for calling me Jessy, that's something."

"I should not have known you ; what has happened—are you not well ?" asked Patty, hurriedly, becoming alarmed at the unearthly aspect of her visitor.

Indeed, her appearance was changed and terrible. Her face looked clay-cold, and clay-wet ; blank and reeking from the agony of brain and heart. Her black eyes had something awful in their wild energy, and her discoloured lips were pressed as one together, as though to master and control the passionate grief that struggled to burst from her. Thus changed, thus possessed, it was no wonder that Patty paused ere she recognised in her visitor the lost, the wretched girl, whose sympathy had awakened in her sorrowing heart a feeling of sisterly pity, of mournful gratitude. Poor creature ! the look of trading misery, the reckless, flaunting air that a few hours since she deemed a fitting, necessary grace, was lost, destroyed in the intensity of mental suffering. Contrasting her past aspect with her present, she seemed a thing of vulgar vice, elevated and purified by agony ; the hideous face of wretchedness affecting mirth, heightened to the solemnity of mortal tragedy.

"What's the matter ? What do you want—here ?" asked Patty, timidly, and endeavouring not to shrink back from the figure which—despite of her attempted firmness—seemed to dilate and grow more terrible before her. "What do you want here ?" repeated Patty, and she glanced at the coffin. The look, on the sudden, changed the woman to meekness ; and the next moment melted her into tears.

"I would not for the world, dear Patty—oh, let me for this night call you so—I would not disturb you, and at such a time—I would not, but there's something at my heart—do let me tell it—do, or my heart will break." With gushing eyes the poor outcast made this passionate request ; and Patty, with pitying looks, offered her a chair.

"What is the matter ?" asked Patty, with her sweet tender voice, made more cordial by the uncontrollable sorrow that possessed her visitor.

"I'll tell you," said the woman, with an effort ; and in a few moments, with dry eyes, but with a voice deep and husky with subdued emotion, she thus proceeded. "I come, Patty, first to ask your forgiveness."

"You never offended me—indeed, no," said Patty.

"I tell you, yes ; many a time I have laughed at you—sneered at you—called you foul names. And why ? It was to relieve my heart—it would have burst if I had not. When I saw you so young, so innocent, so cheerful, working early and late for the dear soul that now lies there"—Patty unconsciously stretched her hands towards the coffin—"Ha !" cried Jessy, "you may look there—you may pray there ! I could not dare to do it—for my mother would rise in her shroud and curse me."

"No, no—do not think so," said Patty, "it is not goodness to think so."

"But let me say," cried Jessy, "what I came to say. You did not know when I sneered and laughed at you, how much I loved you ; but was it for such as I was to say so? No; and so I relieved my heart with madness and vile words, and—but that is over; I have seen that to-night”—here the woman shuddered, and her cheek quivered with terror—“seen what has changed me.”

“Thank heaven for it, Jessy,” cried Patty, with a look of gladness.

“You forgive me?” Patty took the speaker’s hand, and pressed it between her own. “And will you, before we part for ever, let me—it will ease my heart—let me tell you my miserable story?”

“If ’twill indeed please you, yes,” said Patty.

“It shall be in a few words—for I am in torment while I speak; yet it is a torment, that a something, I know not what, will make me suffer. I am country-born; my childhood was one long happy holiday: I was an only child, and was to my father as his heart was to his bosom. All life to me was nothing but happy sounds and happy sights. My first trouble was the departure of a neighbour’s son for the sea: but we parted with a vow of lasting love, and that vow was approved by our parents. I—I—two years passed—my heart was changed; some devil had altered my nature—I became vain, headstrong, selfish—I left my father’s house a wicked, guilty thing, and for three years have tried to hide my shame here, in London. Oh! those three years! Had the sky for that time rained fire upon me, I had not suffered half so much. My story is nearly done. Two hours since I was in the street—laughing, loudly laughing from an empty and corrupted heart. A man slowly passed me; with a laugh, I laid my hand upon his shoulder—he turned his head—oh, Christ! it was my father!”

With these words the wretched woman sank back in the chair, and with fallen mouth, fixed eyes, and ghastly features, looked, on the sudden, death-struck. Patty was about to rise to seek assistance, when Jessy grasped her by the hand, and held her with convulsive strength.

In a few minutes she became composed, and then proceeded:—

“Patty, I am now determined. I quit this life of horror. I will pray to find something like peace—like goodness. I have done you harm—will you forgive me—forgive the wretched Magdalen—and—yes—pray for her?”

Saying this, Jessy, in a passion of grief, dropped upon her knees. Patty, starting from her chair, and hiding her face in her hands, sobbed—

“I do forgive you—I pray for you—I—God in heaven bless and strengthen you!”

A Funeral. St. James's Palace.

The Prince of Wales.

“*W*E give Thee hearty thanks for that it hath pleased

Thee to deliver this our sister out of the miseries of this sinful world—”

Thus, in measured, metallic note, spoke the curate of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields—whilst the daughter Patty could have screamed in anguish at the thanksgiving. A few more words—another and another look—yet another—now the piling earth has hidden all—and the forlorn creature stands alone in the world. The last few moments have struck apart the last link that still held her to a beloved object—and now indeed she feels it is in eternity. Two or three women press about her—turn her from the grave—and, garrulously kind, preach to her deaf ears that “all is for the best,” and that “to mourn is a folly.”

All this I gathered from the gossips who brought back Patty to her dreary, empty home. There, after brief and common consolation, they quitted her—and there, for a time, the reader must leave the stricken, meek-hearted feather-dresser.

Early the next morning, I found myself in the hands of Mr. Flamingo. The slight disorder—in truth, more avowed than real—I had suffered in the round-house, had, in the eyes of the tradesman, been amply remedied by Patty, and my owner turned me reverently between his thumb and finger, and gazed and gazed at me as though, for his especial profit only, I had dropt from the wing of an angel.

St. James's Palace.

Great was the stir throughout the household of Flamingo—and great the cause thereof. He had received an order from the palace of St. James's: his very soul was plumed—for he should get off his feathers!

This I heard and saw, and—I confess it—with the trepidation of expectant vanity, beheld the feather-merchant make selection from his stock. At length, with melting looks, and a short, self-complacent sigh, he placed me—I was sure of it—as the crowning glory, the feather of feathers, among my kind. I was to wave my snowy purity in St. James's!

And for this, thought I, was I drest—prepared by the lean fingers of want, in an unwholesome garret? Alas! I have since felt—ay, a thousand times—that, if dim-eyed vanity would use the spectacles of truth, she would at times see blood on her satins—blood on her brocades—blood on her lace—on every rich and glistening thread that hangs about her—blood. She would see herself a grim idol, worshipped by the world's unjust necessities—and so beholding, would feel a quicker throb of heart, a larger compassion for her forced idolaters.

"To the palace," cried Flamingo to the hackney-coachman, summoned to bear myself and companions on our glorious mission. "To the palace," cried the feather-merchant, with new lustre in his eyes, harmony in his voice, and a delicious tingling of every nerve that filled his whole anatomy with music. "To the palace," were really the words uttered by Flamingo; yet in very truth, he believed he said—"To Paradise."

Not that St. James's was terra incognita to Mr. Flamingo; a Marco Polo's domain filled with golden dreams. Certainly not: Mr. Flamingo knew exactly the number of steps composing that private way to heaven,—the back staircase. He had smiled, and trembled, and bowed and wriggled, and smirked and cringed his way to the patronage of Queen Charlotte (of odorous memory). This exalting truth Mr. Flamingo had several times tested; and that in a matter peculiarly flattering to himself. For instance, a very fine cockatoo had been thrown in to the tradesman among a lot of foreign feathers: this cockatoo Mr. Flamingo submitted to the inspection of her Majesty, who was graciously pleased to say to it "Pretty Poll." On another occasion, Flamingo took a Java sparrow to the palace; which bird was graciously permitted by the Queen to perch upon her little finger, her Majesty still further condescending to cry—

The Story of a Feather.

"Sweet-sweet!" These circumstances were at the time totally overlooked by the Court historian; but they are recorded, written in very fine round-hand, in the "Flamingo Papers."

I had scarcely been an hour in the Palace, ere my memory began to fail me. Yes, all the previous scenes of my existence, that an hour before lived most vividly in my recollection, began to fade and grow dim, and take the mingled extravagance and obscurity of a dream. Was it possible that I had ever been a thing of barter between a savage and a sailor for pig-tail? Could I have ever known a Jack Lipscomb? Had I crossed the seas in the dungeon of a ship? Was it possible that I could detect the odour of bilge-water? Was there such a haunt for human kind as the Minories? And that old Jew—surely he was a spectre—a part of night-mare? His large-lipped, globe-eyed daughter, too, she—with all her plumpness—was no more substantial! And then, that dim garret in the alley—the death and enduring innocence—the heaviness and misery of human days—the suffering that made of mortal breath a wearying disease—all the worst penalty of life—had I known and witnessed it? Could it be possible? And was there really a Patty Butler looking with meek face upon a frowning world, and smiling down misfortune into pity?

I confess that—having delighted in the atmosphere of a palace for scarcely an hour—all these realities seemed waning into visions of a fevered sleep. It was only by a strong effort—by a determination to analyse my past emotions—that I could convince myself of the existence of a world of wretchedness without—of want, and suffering, and all the sad and wicked inequalities of human life. How may sudden prosperity mingle Lethe in its nectar?

I pass by moments of tumultuous anxiety—of hope, painful in its sweet intensity—of the delirium of assured aggrandisement. It is now the remnant of my former self that speaks, and, therefore, be the utterance calm and philosophic.

It was my fate to be chosen one of the three plumes—be it remembered, the middle and the noblest one—to nod above the baby Prince of Wales, all royally slumbering in his royal cradle.

It was my destiny, in 1762, to commemorate the conquest and bloodshed of 1345—to represent an ancestral plume whereof poor John of Bohemia was plucked that he of the black mail might be nobly feathered: yes, it was my happy duty to wave above Ich Dien in 1762.

Ich Dien—"I serve." Such is the Prince of Wales's motto; and looking down upon the Princelet's face—upon his velvet cheek brought into the world for the world's incense—viewing the fleshly idol in its weak babyhood,—I repeated for it "I serve!" And then, in the spirit of the future, asked—What? Bacchus—Venus—or what nobler deity?

The Prince of Wales—a six weeks' youngling—sleeps, and ceremony, with stinted breath, waits at the cradle. How glorious that young one's destinies! How moulded and marked—expressly fashioned for the high delights of earth—the chosen one of millions for millions' homage! The terrible beauty of a crown shall clasp those baby temples—that rose-bud mouth shall speak the iron law—that little pulpy hand shall hold the sceptre and the ball. But now, asleep in the sweet mystery of babyhood, the little brain already busy with the things that meet us at the vestibule of life—for even then we are not alone, but surely have about us the hum and echo of the coming world,—but now thus, and now upon a giddy throne! What grandeur—what intensity of bliss—what an almighty heritage to be born to—to be sent upon this earth, accompanied by invisible angels to take possession of!

The baby king coos in his sleep, while a thousand spirits meet upon the palace floor—sport in the palace air—hover about the cradle—and with looks divine and loving as those that watched the bulrush ark tossed on the wave of Egypt, gaze upon the bright new-comer, on him that shall be the Lord's anointed! What purifying blessings purge the atmosphere of all earthly taint! What a halo of moral glory beams around that baby head—that meek vicegerent of the King of kings! Wisdom will nurse him on her knees—Pity and Goodness be his play-fellows—Humility and Gentleness his close companions—and Love for all men, a monitor constant as the pulses of his heart!

And will it, indeed, be so? Poor little child—hapless creature—most unfortunate in the fortune of a prince! Are such, indeed, the influences about your cradle—will such, in very truth, be your teaching? Will you, indeed, be taught as one of earth—a thing of common wants and common affections? Will you be schooled in the open pages of humanity—or taught by rote the common cant of princes? Will you not, with the first dim glimmerings of human pride, see yourself a thing aloof from all—a piece of costly selfishness—an idol formed only for the knees of men—a superhuman creature, yea, a wingless deity? Will not this be the teaching of the court—this the lesson that shall prate pure nature from your heart, and place therein a swelling arrogance, divorcing you from all, and worshipping self in its most tyrannous desires, in its deepest abominations? Will you remain among the brotherhood of men,—or will you be set apart only to snuff their incense and to hear their prayers? Splendid solitude of state — most desolate privilege of princes!

With this thought, I felt a strange compassion for the Prince of Wales. All the glories of the palace seemed to vanish from about me, and I looked down upon the sleeping creature whom I was there to honour, with a deep pity, a sorrow for the slippery, trying fortune he was born to.

The Prince of Wales Exhibited.

The Countess Blushrose.      Dreadful Accident to Mr. Flamingo.

SOON discovered that their Majesties George the Third and Queen Charlotte had benevolently consented that their baby should be exhibited to the men and women of England. These tidings had rung like a merry peal of bells throughout London; and on the very morning after my exaltation to the Prince of Wales's coronet, crowds were clustering at the gates of the palace.

Here, however, I must fain confess to a disappointment. Being in the very temple of royalty, I at first indulged in the most extravagant expectations of the moral dignity, the uttered wisdom of the high and fortunate people about me. I watched the King's mouth, as a bride gazes on her wedding casket, rapt with an assurance of its contained richness. I followed the motions of the Queen, as though, for a time, she had taken leave of the skies, to dazzle and to dignify a benighted planet. Such were my first emotions: but let me be frank—they were of brief endurance. I very soon discovered his dread Majesty to be a mere man who loved mutton for dinner, and the Queen from Paradise, a quiet little woman, with a humility so marked that it disclaimed not decimal fractions.

And then there were the Lords in Waiting—the Gentlemen of the Bed-chamber—the women of the like Elysium—and those doomed, fragile dolls and victims of state—God help them! —the Maids of Honour. In the simplicity of my inexperience, I believed all these people to be of another order of flesh and blood—to possess a more exquisite anatomy—to be refined by the pure and healthful atmosphere of a court into natures above the sordid influences of this nether sphere; to be, indeed, mid-intelligences between men and angels. Must I say it? I have found the coarse mind of the merest footman in the lackey peer; and in the Lady of the Bedchamber, the small envy, the petty heart-burning of Molly the chambermaid at the Star and Garter. Alas, too! for the Maids of Honour! Hapless images of ceremony—poor, moving anatomies, with eyes that must not wink, tongues that must not speak; and, hardest tyranny of all, with mouths that must not yawn at the dull discipline that consumes them. I have seen them in the royal presence stand on their throbbing feet, until the blood has vanished from their lips. Had I been a fairy wand, I would have changed them straight; have bestowed upon them the paradise of a three-legged stool, with a cow to milk beneath the odour-breathing hawthorn.

If, however, the Maids of Honour affected my compassion, the Ladies in Waiting excited my highest admiration. Here, I thought, are women—doting wives and loving mothers—quitting the serene and holy circle of their own hearths—relinquishing for an appointed term the happiness and tenderness of home, to endure a glorifying servitude beneath the golden yoke of Ceremony. Here, at least, I thought, is self-devotion: here a noble sacrifice to noble objects—here at once the heroism and the true religion of loyalty.

The Countess Blushrose was a Lady in Waiting. Providence had expressly fashioned her for the ennobling function. She had some vague notion that there were human creatures; a white race, something higher in the scheme of the world than the mere Hottentot: but it was also a part of her creed that, like horses and oxen, they were sent for no other purpose to this earth, save for that of ministering in any manner to the will and wish of herself, her friends, and her immediate acquaintance. The Countess never neglected her religious duties, for she had a pew that a Sybarite might have slept in; and therefore generally once a week seemed to listen to the home-simplicities of the pulpit—of death, and common dust, and common judgment. Nevertheless, it was plain that her ladyship possessed a strength of mind that continued superior to such antique prejudices—hence, for many a year, she remained an unconverted hearer. The world, the habitable world, to her was composed of about an area of two miles, with St. James's Palace for the centre. Any part beyond that boundary was, to her, mysterious as the Mogul country: she looked upon it with the intelligence that possessed the theological opponents of Columbus, when he talked of a new continent: allowing it to exist, and to be once reached, there were certain currents that rendered impossible any return from it. To the Countess Blushrose, Nature herself had written Nec ultra on the west side of Temple Bar.

The Countess was allowed to be beautiful as the most beautiful statue: and save in the presence of Majesty, viewed all things unbendingly and with a stony gaze. She seemed to make the atmosphere about her cold by her very looks. She rather appeared an exquisite piece of machinery—an improvement on the mechanist's wooden bird and iron fly of old—a wonderful work constructed and adorned by the laboured ingenuity of man, than a creature warmed by human blood, and sanctified with a human soul. Yet men called her beautiful. Nay, born a baronet's daughter, she had owed her coronet to her creamy cheek and high, abstracted gaze. The heart of the Earl of Blushrose had been led away in chains of ice. He had been frozen into matrimony by the spells of a sorceress; and, influenced by his partner, seemed to his old friends never to have recovered his natural heat.

At the time of my elevation to St. James's, the Countess had only one day relieved a sister Lady in Waiting in her exalted ceremonies. At that time, the Countess had an infant son—Lord Tootle—in the cradle. She was very fond of it—really very fond of it; but then she felt such devotion towards the Palace. This truth I afterwards learned from a brief incident. The child was born weak and puny. “Madam,” said the Doctor, “you must nurse this babe yourself.”

“How can you talk so ridiculously, Doctor?” said the Countess.

“Indeed, your ladyship, I advise only what is necessary—indispensable,” urged the Doctor.

“Necessary! How can I submit to such a tie when there is the Palace to—”

“Well, Madam,” said the Doctor in conclusion, casting a significant glance at the babe, and then at its mother,—“if you do not nurse the child yourself, my word upon it, ’twill die—die, Madam, die.”

Whereupon the Countess, gently elevating her eyelids, said—and only said—“Poor thing!”

I have dwelt thus long upon the character of the Countess Blushrose, as she will be found a somewhat important person in my narrative. Indeed it was to her that I owed my speedy removal from the palace. But of this in due time.

The Story of a Feather.

At the opening of this chapter the reader was acquainted with the condescending intention of their Majesties: the Prince of Wales, in his cot or cradle of state, was to be exhibited in bib and tucker to his future liege subjects. Every precaution had been made to prevent the too near approximation of the curious vulgar to the resplendent baby: the rockers sat at the cradle within an inclosure at the end of a state apartment, part of the royal household lined the room, and then, units of the world without were suffered to enter at one door, and walking past the cradle, and casting one look—for a second was scarcely possible—at the majestic infant, were rapidly conducted out at a door opposite, to the world they had come from; a world they felt themselves henceforth authorised to gladden with tales of the baby Prince—of the glories of a palace.

It was curiously instructive to watch the beaming countenances of the happy few who, having elbowed it lustily in the crowd outside—who in the excess of loyalty had thrust and fought their neighbours to catch a look of princely babyhood—now arranged their rumpled habits, and tried to conjure serenity to their red and streaming faces. Men and women of nearly all conditions poured along the room, and glanced at that marvellous baby. The only court attire commanded for the event was decent cleanliness—in very truth (if history be anything), not always palace wear.

Great was the veneration paid to the Prince! Men, whom I afterwards recognised in the world, came to look their homage to the all-excelling infant; men, who with red wine on their table, and their knees at the Christmas fire, would with barred and bolted door hear the starved orphan wail the Christian carol in the frozen street; men, with hearts close as their fobs, felt the said hearts marvellously touched and melted when they looked upon the Prince! How deep, how exceeding their sympathy for baby helplessness hedged about by palace guards,—how beautiful, how touchingly beautiful, is infancy born to dominion whereon “the sun sets not!”

And there were other lookers—honest, simple souls, who with a hurried, almost fearful glance at baby royalty, felt themselves richer for their coming lives. They had seen things called babies before, but the Prince was a blessing—a glory in lace, for the first time vouchsafed to the world.

Some trod the palace floor as though they feared to hear their own breath: had their shoes creaked, it was plain they must have fainted.

Others, again, looked anxiously, fearfully about them, as though, like men in an Indian wood, they feared some wild beast, with death in its jaws, to spring out upon them. Many of these—I watched them—never saw the Prince at all. They approached the cradle pantingly, but urged on by the attendants, passed it ere they could call up courage to look upon the dazzling glory within.

I was thus contemplating the various characters of the crowd, when I beheld a face I thought not wholly strange to me. After a minute I recognised the visitor: it was my first acquaintance in England, Shadrach Jacobs, the old Jew of the Minorities. Having that day washed himself, it was difficult for any one to detect the Hebrew dealer through the strange disguise. Washed, however, he had been,—washed, and dressed in black and buckles, as though he had been going to court at the New Jerusalem. He hobbled past the cradle, gazing with his raven eye, which kindled sparkingly, but whether at the babe or the lace that half smothered it, I leave to be divined by the genii of Solomon's brazen kettles.

Immediately following the Jew came Miriam, his voluminous daughter. Great was her beauty, but greater still her strength: else how at her ears, her neck, wrists, and fingers, could she have borne the many trophies of her victories bought by sailors' wages out of goldsmith's cases? Miriam was there; but where was Jack Lipscombe? Where was my first English friend? Alas! sick, perilously sick on an outward-bound voyage. Poor Jack was in his hammock. No matter. Tom Braceley of the "Good Intent" went with Miriam to St. James's.

Thus, seeing an old acquaintance, my thoughts went to Patty Butler. "Will she," I asked myself, "be here?" Then I looked hopefully about me. Another minute, and I saw—not Patty—but her smug employer, Mr. Flamingo, with Mrs. Flamingo beside him—both gazing about them, joyous as spirits new to Paradise. Though Flamingo was loyal to the very nails, his visit was not paid only to the infant Prince. No; feathers had something to do at the tradesman's heart, and he came—kindly bringing his wife with him—to behold the exaltation of his ware. I could see him look up at myself and two companions, as if he felt the soul of the

The Story of a Feather.

Prince was there in the white plumes, and nowhere else ; as if the dignity of the Prince would have been naked as a day-old sparrow, but for the feathers, which were—in Flamingo's mind—its natural clothing.

With these feelings Flamingo approached the cradle, and Flamingo's evil spirit kept close at his skirts.

The Prince of Wales has fallen fast asleep. Flamingo prepares himself to look his homage. He is as close as ceremony permits his advance : when some demon in the air tickles his nostrils, for the feather-merchant stands fixed, throws his head back, and explodes in the loudest sneeze that ever profaned the roof-tree of a palace.

As Flamingo sneezed, the Prince of Wales, startled by the noise, woke—and waking, roared most lustily. The baby of a bacon-fed ploughman never yelled in higher pitch.

Flamingo was about to pray that the floor would open and swallow him. Ere, however, he could frame his petition, he was hurried to the door by the attendants ; further admission was denied to thronging sight-seers, and for that day (and all owing to the untowardness of a sneeze), the show was ended.

I am Carried off from the Palace.

The Countess Blushrose and her Chaplain.

EW and brief were my days of glory in the Palace. Long ere the Prince of Wales cut his first tooth (what a chapter might be written on the teeth of princes!) I was removed from my high, intoxicating place of state; plucked from the coronet. Nevertheless, a splendour still hung about me; I was still enriched by the recollections of the past. I had waved above the slumbers and the waking smiles of the Prince of Wales—I had been a type of state and honour—I had been glorified by position—and was, therefore, a relic dear to the associations of those who trod the carpet of a palace as though they walked the odorous turf of Eden. It was to this love, this veneration, that I am convinced, I owed my speedy removal from St. James's. Had the Countess Blushrose felt less devotion towards the Prince of Wales, I might for years have remained in the Palace; it may be, thrown aside to pass into the stomachs of Palace moths. I was, however, doomed to a more various destiny. The Countess Blushrose refined away the vulgarity of mere honesty by the excess of loyalty. A philosopher, or—if he were duly hired for the coarse word—an old Bailey practitioner, would say the Countess stole me. Well; in hard, iron phrase, she did so; but surely the spirit that prompted the felony, made the theft a divine one! Even the accusing angel must have put his finger to his lip, and inwardly said "Mum!" as the Countess, in a flutter of triumph, bore me from the Palace. How her heart beat—for, singly concealed under her short satin cloak, I felt the throbbing organ—beat, as the beautiful robber entered her carriage.

I doubt not, there are simple folks who will marvel at this story—nay, it may be, give no belief to it. They may ask—"What! a countess filch a feather, when a word in the proper place would doubtless have made it her lawful chattel? Such petty pilfering might have been looked for at the hands of Mrs. Scott, the Prince's wet-nurse—of Jane Simpson or Catherine Johnson, rockers—but from Countess Blushrose!"

I confess it: in my inexperience of the world, such were the very thoughts that oppressed me; now it is otherwise. Not without melancholy I own it: but I have found that with some natures it would pain and perplex their moral anatomy to move direct to an object: like snakes, they seem formed to take pleasure in indirect motion; with them the true line of moral beauty is a curve. Had Queen Charlotte herself bestowed me upon the Countess, the free gift, I am sure of it, had not conveyed so much pleasure as the pilfered article.

Borne from the palace, I speedily arrived at the mansion of the Countess, in — Square. A curious adventure greeted me, I may say, at the threshold. As her ladyship passed through the hall, she was met by a mild gentlemanly looking person. There was a certain meaning in his look—a something significant of disquietude softened and controlled by constitutional calmness. "May I speak some words with your ladyship?" he asked.

"Certainly, Mr. Inglewood," answered the Countess; and, turning into an apartment, she let her cloak drop from her shoulders, cast me upon the table, and then, with the voluptuous majesty of Juno, sank upon a chair. "Have you heard how the dear Bishop is to day?" she inquired; and, then, without waiting for an answer, she continued: "poor man! what he's made of I can't think—mere flesh and blood had never lasted till now."

"His lordship has been a great sufferer," replied Mr. Inglewood; "but to-day he is better."

"But there's no hope—impossible. He mends and he mends; but then he breaks and he breaks. That's enough of his ought to have killed anybody. Well, Mr. Inglewood,"—and here the Countess, lifting me from the table, and now idly fanning her cheek with me, and now breathing upon me, and smiling as at her breath I trembled—"well, Mr.

Inglewood," she said, "I suppose we must all die."

"Thank God!" was the answer.
"Really now," asked her ladyship still waving me to and fro in her white hand, "don't you think this world would be a much prettier place if death never showed his wicked features in it?"

Mr. Inglewood gravely shook his head, and then with a gentle smile asked—"Ought we to say wicked, madam?"

"I can't tell—perhaps not; you as a clergyman are bound, you know, to have other opinions. And yet," added her ladyship, condescending to glance with brilliant archness at the reverend man,—“and yet, I dare say death, though at times he may be thought a tolerable sort of thing by a curate, is ugly enough—oh, a perfect fright—to a bishop.”

“I hope not, Madam,” answered the private chaplain of the Countess.

“You have no notion,” asked her ladyship, “who will have the vacant mitre? Very good, Mr. Inglewood; by that look of humility I can perceive that mitres make no part of your dreams. You are above such vanities.”

“In truth, your ladyship, though I’m not of humbler stuff than bishops are sometimes made of—”

“Certainly not,” interrupted the Countess quickly; “I don’t see why you should despair. There is the Bishop of —; he was only chaplain, and taught—what is it!—hic, hoc to the children. You are certainly as good as he—and then you can swim so well! How lucky it was that you brought his lordship’s nephew out of the Isis! How very lucky for your prospects—though I doubt if the younger brother will ever thank you for it. How strange now, if some day it should prove that you fished a mitre from a river!”

Thus spoke her ladyship to the dependant parson—spoke in a cold, icy tone of banter, that—I could see it—made the man wince as he listened.

“Madam,” said Inglewood, “I have no such hope; I will add, no such wish. Contentment—”

“To be sure!” cried her ladyship—“contentment is the prettiest thing in the world. Oh, it saves people such a deal of trouble! ’Tis an excellent thing—a beautiful invention for the lower orders; and then it’s so easy for them to obtain—easy as their own bacon, milk, and eggs.”

“Very often, Madam,” replied Inglewood, with some emphasis; “nay, too often, quite as easy.”

“But with us, who are constantly troubled with a thousand things, contentment would be as out of place as a gipsy in a court suit. I think, if ever in my life I was to feel perfectly and truly content, I should expire on the instant.”

“We pray against sudden death,” said Inglewood, solemnly.

“Lud!” cried the Countess, startled by her chaplain’s tone—“don’t name it; I do, most heartily. Don’t talk of it—I’d forgot—you had something to say, Mr. Inglewood?”

“Will you forgive me, Madam,” said the chaplain, “if, presuming on my function, I interfere with matters in this house, as I have been told, not within my duties?"

The Countess Blushrose and her Chaplain.

"Mr. Inglewood!" cried the Countess, with some surprise, throwing me upon the table, "pray go on, sir: as a clergyman, nothing, sir, should be below your interference that—"

"That affects the peace of mind—the happiness of a fellow-creature," added Inglewood.

"Very right, sir; very right: as a Christian minister of the Established Church, nothing less should be expected of you. I have the greatest opinion of your morals, Mr. Inglewood—the greatest. I only hope that the Earl—for I can perceive, by your manner, that it is of his lordship you are about to speak—"

"Indeed, madam—I—"

The interruption was in vain. The Countess, with increasing rapidity of speech—accompanied with gestures that left nothing for the chaplain to do, save to await with resignation the moment of silence—continued to repeat her sentiments of confidence in the judgment, vigilance, and devotion of the divine, together with hints and suspicions directed at the connubial loyalty of his lordship, towards whom her vanity took the place of love. It was her instant and fixed belief that her chaplain—the man of peace—was about to vindicate his functions by becoming a domestic tell-tale; that he was about to prove himself her faithful friend, by making her "the most wretched of women."

At length—for even the tongue of a vain and jealous woman will stop (an invincible proof of the ending of all mortal things)—at length the Countess was silent; and, throwing herself back in her chair, with the deepest devotion of a domestic heroine, was prepared for the worst. She had always felt that she was reserved by fate for something dreadful, and the moment was arrived! The Earl was a fickle, false, and selfish man, and she—sweet martyr to the marriage service—she, alas! was his wife.

"Madam," said Inglewood, somewhat abashed and confounded by the energy of the Countess, "were I base enough—but no"—and the chaplain stammered, and his face for a minute flushed—"I have no word to speak of the Earl: were there that to say of him which your ladyship's fears—most groundless fears, I am sure—would listen to, it would little suit my place or nature, Madam, to utter it."

"What does the man mean?" asked the Countess. "Did you not say that you had to speak of something that affected happiness and peace of mind—and all that ?”

“True, Madam,” answered Inglewood.

“Well, then—and to whose happiness, to whose peace of mind could you possibly allude, if—”

“Will your ladyship hear me ? I will be very brief,” said the chaplain, with an inward twinge—a rising of the heart—at the inborn, ingrained selfishness of the beautiful creature before him.

“Oh, say what you like—I suppose I must hear you,” answered the Countess, again taking me from the table, and pettishly waving me about her.

“A person in your ladyship’s household has committed a fault—”

“Of course,” said the Countess—“such creatures do nothing else.”

“She has proved not trustworthy in the duty confided to her.”

“I hear of nothing else,” cried the Countess, waving me more violently. “Let her be turned away immediately.”

“You will pardon me, Madam : she was about to be cast from the house—cast out broken-hearted and with a blighted name—when I took it on myself to stand between her, and, for what I know, destruction, and to plead her cause before you.”

The Countess looked at the chaplain impatiently—angrily, and then said, “Mr. Inglewood, I am sorry for it. I wish you would confine yourself to your duties.”

“And what, may it please your ladyship—what are they ?” asked the clergyman, with calm voice and fixed look.

“I trust, sir, you know them—to say prayers, and make or read a sermon,” answered the Countess.

“And nothing more, Madam ?” inquired Inglewood.

“Surely not. What else ?” cried her ladyship, with raised voice and wondering eyes.

“At least, Madam, to strive to practise what I pray and preach,” answered the chaplain.

“Mr. Inglewood, his lordship, out of esteem for you, placed you here ; you were lucky enough to save a relative’s life, and perhaps it was right—I don’t say it wasn’t—to acknowledge the attention ; nevertheless, I will have no monkish, papistical principles put forward in this house. If you can comport yourself with respect and decency, as a chaplain ought to do, remain where you are ; if not—I say, if not, sir—but you of course know what must follow.”

“Perfectly well, Madam. I am either to remain a salaried mockery—an inward apostate—a thing of outward observance—”

The Countess Blushrose and her Chaplain.

"I beg, sir," cried the Countess impatiently—"I beg you will use better language."

"A creature, wearing the skin-deep livery of truth," continued Inglewood, his face glowing, and his eye flashing as he spoke—"foul and leprous within—a hideous mountebank, owing the daily bread of daily hypoerisy to an adroit juggling with words; I am to do this, to take the place of the fool of other times in his lordship's household, or I am to quit it? His lordship, Madam—"

But at this moment Earl Blushrose entered the apartment.

XI

Domestic Happiness of the Earl and Countess Blushrose.

Peculation by Lord Tootle's Maid.

“I am always happy to listen to Mr. Inglewood,” said the Earl, politely bowing towards the wife of his bosom. His lordship then graciously smiled upon his chaplain, and drawing a chair, ceremoniously seated himself, as though resigned to a long discourse. This formality somewhat abashed the worthy chaplain; but there was another circumstance which increased his confusion. He knew that for the past week the wedded couple had not once met; and the feigned civility interchanged between them gave certain omen of a rising storm. Their general bearing was that of polished indifference; but when either of them was stung into extreme politeness, hostilities were sure to follow. The Earl could have loved his wife, nay, when he married, he did love her: but she had chilled him into coldness. Her excellent beauty had fascinated him; but too late he found that he had sacrificed his dearest hopes to a statue. The Countess was that most terrible, but happily that rarest, evil of creation, a selfish woman. Supremely arrogant in her personal charms, her looking-glass presented her with all the external world contained; whilst self—self—self sang to her soul a never-ending lullaby. “Would to God!” cried her husband, as one day he looked upon her fatal loveliness with moistening eyes—"would to God she could change that face for a heart!" She would not have bartered one day's bloom of it for the maternal pride of a Cornelia.

"And now, Mr. Inglewood," said the Earl, "now for your household sermon. I see how it is," he continued, marking the discomfort of the chaplain, keenly observing too the cloudy brow of the Countess,—“I see how it is; as usual, you have been discoursing to her ladyship.”

Here Inglewood inwardly shivered; for he knew by fatal experience how his lordship—otherwise kind and considerate towards him—delighted to play him off in his churchman's character against the Countess. It was, to the Earl's thinking, an exquisite touch of policy to correct his wife—correct, did I say? no, the Earl had no such desperate thought; but to punish the partner of his fortunes with the rod of the Church. The Earl, I say, considered this to be a stroke of fine policy: some folks may call it conjugal cowardice.

"My lord," said Inglewood, determined to make an effort to extricate himself—"I will defer my suit—for, indeed, it was a suit I had to urge, and not a sermon—until to-morrow."

"Certainly not, Mr. Inglewood," cried her ladyship, affecting a distrustful glance towards her husband.

"Proceed, I beg of you. I assure you, my lord, Mr. Inglewood was talking very charmingly—very much so when you interrupted us. I am sure he had something of importance to communicate; something that you, doubtless, ought to hear—I beg he will continue." All this was said with meaning, inquisitive eyes, and in a tone of suppressed suffering; so admirably did the unfeeling wife act jealousy—so perfectly did her very heartlessness assume a heart. At once, his lordship knew that he was reserved for some mysterious mischief, and so resolved to make the first attack.

(Poor Inglewood—poor chaplain! And he—he was to be the sentient shuttlecock, struck in cruel sport from wife to husband—from husband back to wife! At that moment how did his heart yearn for the paradise of a Welsh eucacy!)

"Her ladyship, Mr. Inglewood," cried the Earl quickly, for the first time in his life getting the advance speech of his wife, and valorously determining to keep it—"Her ladyship—for all she may affect towards yourself—has, I know, the greatest veneration for your worth, your honesty. She loves plain-speaking dearly; though perhaps it might be inpolitic at all times to avow it. Still, Mr. Inglewood, you must not be too ascetic with her ladyship; you must be a little indulgent. You must not wage such a deadly crusade against piquet. I know what you have said of a woman gamester; I have listened with great edification to your description of the terrible sect; have really shuddered at the frightful picture; at the anatomy, I may say, you have prepared from what for all good purpose has ceased to live—a lady gambler; nevertheless, my dear Mr. Inglewood”—and here his lordship wreaked such cordiality upon his remonstrance—“nevertheless, you must not confound a casual instance with a custom; you must not consider her ladyship a hopeless idolater of painted paper, if now and then—to give wings to a heavy hour—she takes a hand or so. Really, you must not, Mr. Inglewood.” Thus spoke his lordship; and in the vanity of his masculine heart he thought he had achieved a wondrous triumph over the woman he had vowed to love and cherish. The lady, however, who had as strongly sworn, proved herself at least an equal match for the man she loved, honoured, and obeyed. As for Inglewood, he sat with his lips glued together. The polite vehemence of the Earl had kept him silent: now, her ladyship was about to speak, and he knew that nought remained for him but to suffer. With what scorching softness in her eyes—with what bitter self-complacency—with what an obtrusive sense of martyrdom,—did the Countess Blushrose carefully construct a handful of innuendos, every one of them enough to wound a woman’s peace for ever!

“I’m sure my lord,”—(if a man could be killed by music, the mortal melody of her ladyship’s well-educated voice had certainly slain her husband,)—“I’m sure, that is I hope, I am always a patient listener to Mr. Inglewood. I know the goodness that prompts him; the conscience that animates every word: I know his devotion to the high and abstract character, as I think I have heard you call it,—you see, my lord, how I treasure all your syllables,—yes, the high and abstract character of his function,—I know his regard for the family—his especial consideration for ourselves, and therefore from him can bear anything. Nevertheless, my lord, as I was saying to Mr. Inglewood when you entered—that is, I was about to say—I would not have him scold you as I know he does. He must not take upon common report—the world is so censorious, the world so delights to destroy wedded confidence—what I never can believe, at least not all of it. And, therefore, my lord, I say he must not scold you.”

(Has the reader watched a well-grown kitten with its maiden mouse? Has he seen how that velvet-coated, playful creature, having first crushed its victim’s loins with all its teeth, drops it; and now, crouching apart, with serene assurance that the miserable wretch cannot escape, watches with sweet forbearance its writhings and its strugglings, the very hopelessness of its agony to get away? How the said kitten,—its claws humanely sheathed, they having already done their work—puts forth one paw, and now taps the mouse on one side—now on the other—and turns it over and over—and all in play—all in the prettiest sport?)

“Madam!” exclaimed his lordship, firing at the word, and then turning fiercely round upon his chaplain,—“Mr. Inglewood, what is this?”

Mr. Inglewood, in patient amazement looked at the wedded pair, then asked, “What, my lord?”

“Am I, sir, indebted to your insinuations for this character? Is it thus, in my own house, you fulfil a mission of peace?”

“I protest, my lord,” stammered Inglewood,—“I protest I”—

“Oh, Mr. Inglewood is a plain speaker,” cried the Countess, delighted at the success of her artifice. “And then so faithful, so vivid an artist, too! I am sure I am delighted with the portrait that, as you tell me, my lord, Mr. Inglewood has passed off for me. It must have been so grateful to a husband,—so flattering to his wife! And then it is so comfortable to have at one’s elbow a kind remembrancer of one’s little faults. Not that I want to know all your lordship’s treasons,—and even if I did, Mr. Inglewood is so good, he would never tell me all.”

The chaplain was by nature and self-discipline a meek, forbearing man, but he was full of generous impulses, and the implied slander of her ladyship was too much for his patience: he therefore committed a great breach of decorum; for, ere her ladyship had well concluded her sentence, Mr. Inglewood brought down his clenched fist upon the table with such a report that the Countess leapt in her chair with a slight shriek. “Mr. Inglewood!” exclaimed the astonished Earl,—“you forget yourself. Do you know, sir, what you are?”

“Yes, my lord,” replied Inglewood,

The Story of a Feather.

with sudden calmness,—“no longer your chaplain. I entered your lordship’s service as a minister of peace : I will not—no, my lord, will not—to suit the fickle humours of the great, be made a scapegoat and a fire-brand. I am no longer, sir, your servant.”

“Come, come,” said the good-natured nobleman, “not so hasty, Mr. Inglewood. Spoil not your hopes in life by a piece of temper.”

“My hopes in this life, my lord,” said Inglewood, “are a quiet conscience, health, and a cordial faith, let them make what mistakes they will, in my fellow-creatures. Of these three hopes, it may please God to deprive me of one; nevertheless, two—whilst my reason lasts—must, and shall remain with me.”

“Mr. Inglewood—I have been wrong; I confess as much, and—”

“My lord,” replied Inglewood firmly, yet respectfully, “I have been wrong; and by quitting your service can make the only reparation due to myself: understand me, my lord—to myself. I now know my place: it must be my own house—my own roof—though wind and snow drive through it; my own hearth, though with scarce a log to warm it; my own time, that I may work to know the mystery within me. I thank you, my lord, with all my heart I thank you, for this relief from bondage. You intended kindly by me : but I feel it, my lord—I should dwarf and wither under your patronage : I should never grow to be a man !”

“You know best,” said the Earl, resuming his dignity. “I would not by my favours blight a giant. Come, come,” said the Earl smiling, “you are a young man—a very young man. Let us talk of this to-morrow.”

“My lord,” answered Inglewood, “I have made my election; I am free. Yet, my lord, let me leave your house a peace-maker.” Then turning to the Countess, he said, “Will your ladyship grant me a moment’s hearing? for what I have to say must interest you.” Her ladyship nodded dignified assent. “I would plead for a weak and foolish woman. She has betrayed her trust. Yet, I believe ’twas pride, a silly pride—no deep sin—that beguiled her.”

“What woman’s this?” asked the Earl.

“One beneath your roof, my lord. One of your tenant’s daughters, hired to tend your child. This morning—”

“Ten thousand pardons, my lady,” cried an elderly, hard-featured woman, bursting into the apartment, “but flesh and blood can’t bear to have such doings made nothing of. If Susan isn't packed off, nobody's safe. I knew his reverence here wanted to talk her off—but—I—I beg your pardon my lady, for breaking in, but everybody's

"What's the matter, Mrs. Pillow—what has Susan done?" asked the Countess.

"Stolen half-a-yard of lace from his lordship's cap," answered Mrs. Pillow.

"Not stolen—not stolen," shrieked a girl, as she rushed in, and with streaming eyes fell at the feet of the Countess. "I never had a thief's thought—never : nurse said 'twas of no use—none ; and I only took it to remember me of that sweet child—I love it dearer than my own flesh—to remember it when I should be old, and baby be a man."

The girl, with clasped hands, looked with passionate grief in the face of the Countess. Her ladyship rose, and fanning her cheek with me -- new from the Prince's coronet—said "Send the culprit from the house, and instantly."

The girl fell prostrate on the floor. Mr. Inglewood followed the Countess with his eyes as, still waving me to and fro, she walked from the room. "God teach you better mercy !" he said in a low voice, and he stooped to raise the heart-stricken offender.

Garrick's "Romeo."

“BEE your ladyship’s pardon—but will your ladyship’s goodness allow a word with your ladyship?”

Thus spoke Mrs. Pillow, the housekeeper, following the Countess from the apartment; and her ladyship, by a motion of the head, implied consent to the petition.

“I shall never forgive myself, never, till my dying day,” said Mrs. Pillow, immediately she found herself closeted with the Countess.

“What has happened now, Pillow?” asked her ladyship listlessly.

“Matter, your ladyship! Well, was there ever such a kind, forgiving mistress! I’m sure, my lady, I”—but here the growing emotion of the housekeeper broke forth in short, quick sobs.

“Another robbery, I suppose?” said the Countess, with affected resignation.

“By no means, my lady,” answered Mrs. Pillow. “Now Susan’s gone—not that she shall leave the house, my lady, before her boxes are well tumbled—I’d answer with my life for the honesty of all of us.”

“Well!” said the Countess, in a fretful tone; and immediately the housekeeper knew she must be brief.

“But, your ladyship,”—and here the tears trickled down Mrs. Pillow’s face like rain-drops down a window-pane—“when I think of my own assurance—my—my—my worse than that, in busting in as I did before your ladyship and my lord—”

The Story of a Feather.

"Well, well, see 'tis not repeated. I suppose it was your zeal for—"

"That's it, your ladyship, that's it. I thought if that hussy—saving your presence—only had the first word, for first words with a brazen face go so far—she might deceive your ladyship; and, like her impudence, she would come to you—but then, what do such trollops know what Providence really made 'em for?—Then I followed her, your ladyship,—and there she would stand in the hall, your ladyship, trying to cry, and aggravating me past Christian flesh and blood with her assurance—and then I—oh, my lady, character's such a jewel, and makes us forget what's proper to ourselves and our betters." And Mrs. Pillow concluded this fragmentary sentence with a new supply of rolling tear-drops.

"That will do—no more—that will do," said the Countess, and her lips almost broke into a forgiving smile. Magical was their effect upon the housekeeper; for Mrs. Pillow wiped her face which, on the instant, was smooth, passionless and glossy, as a face of ornamental china. "Mr. Inglewood leaves us," said the Countess.

"I am not surprised at that, my lady, if Susan goes." Her ladyship, turning quickly round, bent a haughtily inquiring gaze upon her servant. Mrs.

Pillow felt she had been too abrupt. "That is, I don't think Susan would have stayed long after him. His reverence once gave the girl a prayer-book, my lady; well, would your ladyship believe it, the wench was always a-reading that book? I always thought it strange, my lady; still I hoped it was nothing but religion. But when people turn thieves, and rob such a sweet baby—oh, your ladyship, what a darling, darling lamb his lordship is! So quiet too! I'm the worst of sinners, if he doesn't cut his teeth like any blessed spirit."

This energetic praise of the baby seemed to touch the maternal instincts of the Countess; for suddenly remembering that she had a child, she said—"Let his lordship be brought to me."

I would fain pass over the emotion of such a mother. The babe was brought; the mother kissed her child—kissed it as a nun would kiss her beads. Two or three minutes passed, and she was about to return it into its nurse's arms, when the fretful creature—it seemed wasting and pining, an offering prepared for death—threw out its tiny hand, and fixed its fingers in its mother's hair, whining and pulling with all its little strength. "Take him away," cried the Countess, with a slight laugh—"the—the little rebel!" and as the babe was borne to the nursery, the mother turned quickly to a mirror, and arranged a few disordered raven threads delicately, tenderly, as though they were vital as her heart-strings.

What knew such a mother of her child? She had heard its first wail—that inconvenience she could not avoid. It was from that moment divorced from her cares. It grew not beneath her eye, taking its hourly life from her; she never knew that sweet communion, when nature touches every nerve to tenderest music, still drawing forth new love, repaid by love increasing; by dawning consciousness; by looks of brightening knowledge; by fitful, broken murmurings, deep with a sense of brooding joy; by all that interchange of mother love and baby happiness; and more, by all those pulses of the soul which, in the thrilling present, assure the blissful future. The Countess saw her child but at stated intervals; she knew she was a mother only by the clock. Her sole offspring was her beauty; that she nursed, that she watched, that she tended; that, with every furtive glance, she with deep affection worshipped. For her child, that was entombed in her face. It was this that to my thought made her hideously lovely—that threw the cancerous aspect of the witch upon the features of a goddess. Of all I have known, the Countess stood apart.

Whilst in the possession of her ladyship I saw all to be seen of the high world. Drawing-rooms—assemblies—balls—the opera—all the shifting scenes, all the beautiful and brilliant things, that make what is called society. I have seen true nobility of heart add lustre to the jewel on its breast; I have seen the man of birth, whose great ancestors were to him as continually present; whose memories were as protecting angels, denying aught of mean, or low, or selfish to approach the sanctuary of his soul; men with hearts and minds sweetened and purified by that everlasting fragrance breathing from good and great men's graves. And I have seen the caittiff whose stars and trinkets, like blazoned coffin-plates, glittered on nothing but corruption; men, with souls dead and noisome, in moving carcases. With indignation did I first behold them; with scorn and a fierce hatred. I called fortune filthy names, and arraigned directing fate of gross venality. This was the passion of very ignorance. Since I have seen the world in its many inequalities, have known and seen how much the selfish lose in what they deem intensity of gain, I have looked upon them with compassion—with a deep, mute pity. Poor small things, infinitely small in their imagined greatness ; men who, like the maggot in a nut, feed and grow gross in darkness, unwitting of the world of light and beauty, without that petty shell of self that circles them !

I have seen too, woman in her sweetest, noblest aspect ; a thing of highest thoughts and deepest tenderness, still elevated—made softer still by ministering tastes, almost refined away from earth—a creature priceless and unpurchaseable as the angels ! Yet have I seen her sold—bartered ; paid for with golden guineas—with tinkling tittle—with flashing coronet. I have heard something of the slave markets of Cairo—of Alexandria ; tales of snow-skinned Georgians and Circassians—of fairest victims vended by avarice to lust. The tales were touching—very, very touching. But hearing them, I have smiled at the wilful ignorance, the smug self-complacency of Britons—I have smiled and remembered me of the slave-markets of St. James's ! “What !” cries the reader, and his lip turns slightly purple with indignation, “St. James's !” Yes, Sir, St. James's ! I have seen blue eyes, pink cheeks, scarlet lips, sold—ay, as you would sell a nosegay—fathers and mothers having a bishop who shall bless the bargain. There is this difference between the Georgian and the British merchandise—a small circle of gold wire about it, no more. Have I not seen creatures with seraphic looks—beings that in real loveliness of form and aspect, in living harmony of gesture—have almost made the imagination barren ; have I not seen them sold to some paralytic Plutus—some half-palsied earl ? No—not sold ; they were married. Their parents made for them good matches ; they were married in a church—married with all the honours.

The bells ring out a merry peal—look at the bride, her colour comes and goes, and her lip shakes like a rose-leaf in the wind ; tears blind her eyes ; and, as she steps from the carriage, the earth whirls about her ! Is that the church-door ? Surely it is the entrance of a tomb. She fights with closed lips—mutely fights against her swelling heart. She raises her eyes—she sees her father's stony face glittering with a smile—a statue in the sun ; beholds her mother's simper—her weight of great content ; she turns—more horrible than all—and catches then the look of him, in some brief minutes to be made her owner ; he smiles, and her heart dies at his Pan-like leer ? Well, they are married ! The bargain is completed—the receipt, a marriage certificate, is duly passed. The happy couple start for his lordship's hall. An ox is roasted—batts of ale are tapped—all is joy and rioting among his lordship's happy people; happy, too, the happiest of the happiest, is his lordship's self! What an excellent match for the bride! how many praise the wisdom—the policy of her parents! How nobly they “have done their duty” by her. Is it not proved by after years? does not her ladyship make an immaculate wife? Is she not chaste as Iceland snows? Can even midnight drunkenness dare to pass a jest upon her? Is she not a pattern of all the choice proprieties? True—very true. Her father and mother are proud of the match—proud of the spotless virtue of their daughter. And she is virtuous. She may, with most serene defiance, think of Westminster Hall; but what has her prudent father to answer, what her most politic mother to reply to that harlotry of soul they have forced upon her—to that inevitable daily falsehood which they have made her act—to that constant lie—that agonising ulcer eating in her heart, most eating when a smile is flickering at her lips?

Is she not a white slave—a Christian slave—a bondwoman bought in a St. James's drawing-room, albeit wedded after at St. James's Church? I have heard of women slaves toiling in rice-grounds, heard of the planter's whip winding like whetted steel around poor woman's form: of these things I have heard. But I have seen white slaves in carriages—have known the agonies inflicted on them by the scourge of their own mind, by the worm preying in their hollowing temples, by the very quietude of their despair.

These scenes I mingled in—these things I saw whilst in the possession of Lady Blushrose. I have, however, trespassed by a long digression—have again committed my usual fault of wandering from the direct line of my story. Let me hasten to return to it.

Some three months after I was stolen—no, taken is the word—from the Palace, the Earl's infant, the heir of his house, fell ill, very ill.

“I am somewhat uneasy about Edward,” said the Earl to his wife, who was drest for the theatre.

“I'm sure he's looking a great deal better—a great deal,” answered the Countess, pressing her little finger to a beauty patch which threatened to fall from her chin. “But if you think it necessary, why not send for Dr. Wilson?”

“Madam,” and the Earl slightly coloured,—“after your conduct to the Doctor this morning, I really have not the courage to send for him.”

The Story of a Feather.

"Conduct! Was not the man insolent?—did he not accuse me of—"

"I fear, Madam, his great offence was—he told the truth," answered the Earl.

"Doctor Wilson is, doubtless, a man of the world—a shrewd man, and passes off brutality of manner, that some people may mistake it for the independence of genius. For my part I have no very high opinion of him. Did he not say that I should kill the child?

The wretch!—kill it—because I had not nursed it myself? Has the man no feeling? Did not all my friends say that I should bring myself to the grave if I did nurse it? And you yourself, know my constitution?"

Garrick's "Romeo."

"Yes, Madam," answered the Earl, gravely; I have often wondered at its excellence—often, too, after the labours of the card-table at four in the morning."

"Now, do not let us quarrel. You shall not spoil my evening—that I am determined. I have made a party with Lady Dinah to see Garrick's Romeo;—I have not yet seen it, and really one might as well be out of the world. You might have accompanied me. I know the time," and the Countess acted a little pouting smile—"that to have seen Romeo and Juliet with me—ah! well, well, marriage turns the poetry of hope into the very prose of reality."

"And you go to see Garrick's Romeo?" asked his lordship, sadly.

"I'm told it's delicious; so full of feeling!" answered the Countess.

"The carriage is at the door, my lady," said the servant.

"You will at least hand me to it," said the Countess, to his lordship, with a seraphic smile.

The Earl raised his eyes to his wife. Still she smiled, and held forth a fairy palm. The Earl sighed, and taking his wife's hand as he would have taken a thistle, led her to the carriage.

Drury Lane Theatre. A Broken-Hearted Woman.

The Countess is summoned Home. An Old Acquaintance.

THE Countess was in raptures with Garrick. Her friend, Lady Dinah, too, a widow of four-and-thirty, whose chief favourite in this life was her own broken heart — was softened to the extreme of tenderness by the passion, the energy, the enthusiasm of the little man. I have said it—Lady Dinah had a broken heart. Happy woman that it was so: for that shattered organ stood to her in the place of a parrot, a spaniel, a precious pet, to be fondled and fed upon the choicest morsels. It was this attention to the craving appetite of her broken heart that brought Lady Dinah to Romeo and Juliet. Sympathy was a necessity of her nature—but then it must be sympathy with the wants and woes of love. At eighteen she had been married to a nobleman of large estate, sixty years old, and a pair of crutches. The daughter of a fox-hunting squire, she had been legally sold to his lordship—vended to the winter-stricken peer, like any peach in January. She had been a widow only four years; her husband, with a stubbornness often peculiar to the ailing, determining not to cancel the contract a single day before. “And so, my dear, that is how my heart was broken.” This was the constant theme of Lady Dinah; who would continually show her broken heart to her friends and acquaintances, as other women would show their china. It was, indeed, her only solace—her only comfort. Her face had in it frank good temper; her eyes were swimming in laughter ; her lips ever curling with smiles—she was altogether a ripe, plump piece of frolic nature ; yet to her five hundred bosom friends she insisted upon being known as “a blighted thing ; indeed, a disappointed woman with a broken heart.” And then she would hint at the mystery of an early passion—of what in her girlhood she had suffered for a first love. This mystery was never cleared ; for I give no credence to the vulgar gossip of her nurse, who, as I heard, declared that her ladyship before marriage had “never loved anything that signified, except green gooseberries.”

The play proceeded, and with every scene the admiration of Lady Blushrose, the emotion of Lady Dinah, increased.

“Tis very nice,” said Lady Blushrose, at a part of the balcony scene.

“Nice, my dear ! it’s delicious,” cried Lady Dinah, and for a moment spreading her fan before her face, she sighed deeply. Very different were the feelings of the two ladies. The one sat as a patroness of the poet and the actor—now and then graciously according an approving smile ; the other was in the scene ; was, indeed,—or assuredly tried to think so,—Juliet herself. “It’s very foolish,” said Lady Dinah, and with an attempt at vivacity, she brushed her handkerchief across her eyes, I do verily believe, thinking there was at least one tear in each of them.

“Dost thou love me ? I know thou wilt say—Ay ; And I will take thy word.”

Thus spoke Juliet, and immediately Lady Dinah, in a whisper to her friend, exclaimed, “Just like me when quite a girl.”

“Good night, good night ! parting is such sweet sorrow,
That I shall say good night till it be morrow.”

Here Juliet disappeared from the balcony, and Lady Dinah, throwing herself back in her seat, slowly shook her head, observing,—“If it doesn’t take me quite to my father’s orchard !”

“My dear child,” said Lady Blushrose, looking round the house—“you distress me, you do, indeed, to find you thus give way to your feelings. You know it’s only a play.”

“Very true—I know that—but memory, memory, my dear ! In this life we—ar’n’t they the Clevelandds opposite ? Lud, no ! I’m getting blind I think—in this life, woman has but one heart, and when that is broken—”

“To be sure. Why, there’s that wretch Huntingtopper,” cried Lady Blushrose, who, whilst sympathising with her friend, had carefully surveyed the boxes.

“He mus’n’t come into the box—

The Story of a Feather.

positively, he mus'n't come into the box. I wouldn't have him see us for the world,—where is he?" Lady Blushrose immediately pointed out to her broken-hearted friend the situation of his lordship, who, on the instant recognising the ladies, kissed his hand to them, and left the box. "He'll never come to us," cried Lady Dinah, as though she expected a reply.

"No doubt he will—and why not?" asked Lady Blushrose.

"Oh, my dear—I quite loathe the man," said Lady Dinah.

"He's very handsome," said Lady Blushrose, believing in that she had said everything.

"But then his sentiments, my dear; so coarse—so little respectful of sympathy—so utterly ignorant or careless of the emotions of the heart."

A knock at the box-door, and, immediately, enter his lordship! He seemed a man of about two-and-thirty. His features were handsome—very handsome; in point of regularity, faultless. A well-formed, well-painted lamp, but with no light in it. As I shortly discovered, his lordship was the veritable Huntingtopper, the lordly master of Mr. Curlwell, whose generosity towards the little feather-dresser was so touchingly displayed in St. Martin's watch-house.

"Well, ladies, how do you like it?

Garriick wants a little of the dash of a giant for my notions of a lover. He's mean—plaguy mean," said Huntingtopper, plunging at once into the play.

"Does your lordship measure hearts by a foot-rule?" asked Lady Blushrose.

"Not exactly—but then, one wants a sort of style in these things: when we talk of heroic poetry, of course, we want people of heroic look to utter it—otherwise it's nonsense, quite nonsense." Thus spoke the lordly critic.

"But altogether, what does your lordship think of Romeo and Juliet?" inquired Lady Dinah, with a downcast look, and in the gentlest tone of voice—yea, almost in the accents of a sufferer.

"There's some good things in it; can't deny that—very decent things in it; but then there's a good deal of stuff. Now, all that we've listened to about the fairy's coach—can any reasonable person make it clear? Come, here's the book," and his lordship read in a loud tone—

"‘Her waggon-spokes made of long spinners' legs,
The cover of the wings of grasshoppers;
Her traces of the smallest spider's web;
Her collars of the moonshine's watery'—"

"Silence in that box!" roared a voice from the gallery, and looking upwards, I recognised my old, honest friend, Luke

THE COUNTESS IS SUMMONED HOME.

The Countess is Summoned Home.

Knuckle, Mr. Flamingo's porter. Luke, otherwise a peaceable fellow, was too much interested in the fate of the lovers to pay any deference to any body in any box ; and, therefore, almost unconsciously rebuked the talkers. His lordship cast a contemptuous look towards the audience, as though one of the dearest prerogatives of high box company—namely, to talk loud at a play to the annoyance of actors and auditors—had been most impudently interfered with. So indignant was his lordship, yet withal so defying of vulgar opinion, that he was about to continue the quotation, when a hurried knock struck at the box-door. It was opened, when one of the Earl's servants delivered a letter to her ladyship.

"It's impossible !" said her ladyship, with slight agitation, having read the note. Then, turning to Lady Dinah, she said,—"My dear, you must excuse me—I am summoned home."

"What has happened ?" cried Lady Dinah.

"Oh, nothing ; that is, nothing but his lordship's groundless fear—I will be back in a short time."

"Pray don't miss the tomb scene," urged Lady Dinah, "but what—what is the matter ?"

"'Tis only to frighten me, I know—it can't be otherwise ; but his lordship writes that dear little Edward is dying. But it can't be—he was so much better this morning. I shall be able to come back, I'm sure."

"To be sure you will," said Lady Dinah, with a comforting manner ; and very willing to be so comforted, Lady Blushrose suffered herself to be handed to her carriage by Lord Huntingtopper.

"You'll have no cause to remain at home, I trust," said his lordship ; "and till you return, I'll talk Shakspeare to the broken-hearted widow." As his lordship, with a peculiar smile, uttered these words, Lady Blushrose raised her fore-finger in playful reproof of Huntingtopper's intention. Ere, however, he could reply to this, the carriage rolled away.

Arriving at his lordship's mansion, the door was already open, and servants already watching the coming of their mistress. There was a sudden look of real seriousness in one or two faces ; in others, worn as a part of the Earl's livery, for the occasion ; a look that convinced me death was in the house. Mrs. Pillow was on the staircase, having descended at the sound of the carriage-wheels. She stood with clasped hands, pursing her mouth, and striving to look smitten to the heart. All she said was—"Oh, my lady ! so sweet a baby !" The Countess slightly trembled at the aspect of the matron, then rapidly passed her. In a minute the mother was in the room where lay her dying child.

The Earl sat at the bedside. Never shall I forget the look with which he met his wife—the mother of his infant. There was no reproof in it—none—but the very eloquence of pity. The Countess was running to the bed, when the Earl arose and folding her in his arms, led her aside.

“He’s not ill—not so very ill?” cried the Countess, hysterically.

“Patience, Margaret, patience,” said the Earl, with apparent calmness. “He may be better—but he is, I fear so at least, much changed.”

“My dear—dear child!” screamed her ladyship. “He will be spared us?”

“Let us hope it, let us pray for it,” said the Earl: “still we must be patient.” He then led his wife to the bed-side; and instantly the grief and cries of the Countess were redoubled. She threw herself upon the bed, and called Heaven to witness how she loved her child.

“A letter, my lord, from Doctor Wilson,” said a servant, presenting a note to the Earl.

“Where—where is the Doctor?” exclaimed the Countess.

“Be calm, my love; I sent for him—he sends this letter,” answered the Earl.

“A letter! Why does he not come?—a letter!” cried the Countess.

“He will not come,” said the Earl. “Listen.” His lordship then read the note of the physician:—

“‘My Lord,—It is with unaffected pain that I cannot feel it due to my professional character to attend your summons. After what fell from her ladyship this morning, I should forfeit all sense of self-respect were I again to do so. Her ladyship expressed a total want of confidence in my skill!’—”

“I never meant it—he knew I never meant it!” cried the Countess in a rage of grief.

“Permit me, however, to recommend to your lordship, the gentleman who is the bearer of this. I have frequently met him in the course of my professional experience, and have great pleasure in herewith testifying to his high ability. I know no man to whose skill I would so readily entrust the health of my own children.

“‘I remain

“‘CHARLES WILSON.’”

“Conduct the gentleman here,” said the Earl.

An Old Acquaintance.

"The Doctor does not tell me, but I have all faith in Wilson, let the gentleman be who he may." As the Earl spoke this, the servant ushered in an old acquaintance of the reader's, no other than Apothecary Lintley. The Countess glanced at his plain outside—for in the days whereof I write, the physician had a more marked exterior than in these one-coated times—and loudly whispered to her husband, "I'm sure he's not a physician."

Lintley, overhearing this, observed—"No, madam, I am not. Dr. Wilson has, however, informed me of the case; it is one I have treated a thousand times among the poor."

At the word "poor," the Countess

The Story of a Feather.

looked toward her husband, as though, of course, he would instantly resent the insult. The Earl, however, immediately addressing himself to Lintley, said—"I am happy, sir, that my child will have the benefit of so much experience."

Lintley then approached the little patient: in an instant I saw in the eye of the apothecary the fate of the babe.

"He is not so very ill, sir?" asked the Countess.

"He is very ill, madam," answered Lintley.

"But not dangerous—nothing dangerous—you will answer for his recovery—of course, with your experience, you can answer?" cried the Countess.

Lintley did not speak, but glanced at the Earl. The father saw there was no hope, and endeavoured to soothe the mother, whose extravagant grief burst forth in the wildest expressions. She hung about the child, and vowed she would never survive it—no, she would be buried with it. She who had loved it so—she who had so treasured her dear, blessed darling! At these words, the Earl hid his brow in his hands, and groaned bitterly.

"Is there nothing, Doctor—nothing that will save him?" cried the Countess.

Lintley still evaded an answer; still the mother asked. At length the apothecary replied—"Nothing, madam—now."

"Oh, I know what you would say—Doctor Wilson has said so, but it was impossible. How could I nurse it—how could I, blessed, dear babe that it is,—but how could I nurse it?"

"Patience, patience, Margaret," said the Earl, taking his wife's hand. And so for hours they sat. As the clock struck six the child died.

And then again and again the Countess mother vowed she would be buried with her darling infant.

I am Purchased by Madame Spanneu.

An Illustration of Human Motives.

THE Countess being placed in mourning—such is the gentle, tender phrase that indicates the call of death at high houses—I was cast aside. Indeed, again and again before the Countess quitted London for Canaan Hall—the family country seat—I heard her vow that she would leave the world for ever. Existence had lost its only value to her; what was life without her darling child? Most vociferous was her grief; whilst the Earl, with calm, deep sorrow, would gaze at her, as I thought, with doubting looks. However, the day after the death of her child, her ladyship departed to feed her misery in solitude. She would henceforth employ herself among her husband's tenantry; she would visit the sick, the widowed, and the fatherless; again and again did she assure her husband that she would be quite a blessing to the poor! Hearing this, and finding myself cast carelessly by, I concluded that I, too, was doomed to a long retirement from the bustling world. In little less than a week, I found it otherwise.

One afternoon I found myself in the hands of Mrs. Pillow, who declared me to be, with other matters—gowns, and gloves, and cloaks, and shoes—her lawful property, by gift from the Countess. This declaration was made by the housekeeper to a short, thin, flauntily-dressed little woman, who evidently gazed at myself and my companions with the depreciating looks of a purchaser.

"There, Madame Spanneu," cried Mrs. Pillow, holding me daintily between her thumb and finger, "I call that a beauty. It's a bit of wirgin snow, and never been in my lady's head but once."

The Story of a Feather.

"La, my dear," said Madame, in a most affectionate tone, "feathers fetch nothing. Indeed, I'm the greatest sinner alive if all business isn't quite gone to the dogs."

"Talking about dogs, Madame Spanneu, how's your husband?" Thus spoke Mrs. Pillow; and though the reader may feel that the inquiry, dictated by a thought of the canine race, was scarcely complimentary to Monsieur Spanneu, it was nevertheless the result of association of ideas in the brain of the housekeeper; for, as I afterwards discovered, Monsieur Spanneu, Parisian born, was an enthusiast in poodles. They were to him as his own flesh and blood. He was their "guide, philosopher, and friend;" though truth compels me to admit that he never hesitated to sell his pupils when he could obtain a purchaser. His fame, indeed, was widely spread throughout the fashionable world, and many were the declining maidens who owed the prime consolation of their lives to the delicate tending of Monsieur Spanneu. Indeed, as I once heard him declare, all his dogs were "dogs of sentiment."

"How is Monsieur?" again inquired Mrs. Pillow.

"Bless your heart, my dear," answered the partner of his soul, "nothing ever ails the brute. Ha! my dear, it serves me right—I would try to learn French, and I'm rightly served for it. That satin, my dear, is stained in three places," and Madame Spanneu pointed to the spots on a rose-coloured gown.

"Well, I always thought it odd as how you could marry a Frenchman," said the housekeeper, sinking the spots of a garment in the blemishes of a husband. "I don't think it's doing the right thing by one's own country."

"My dear, I had my scruples; but then he said he was a Count. What shall I give you for the lot?"—and again Madame jumped from thoughts conjugal to matters of business.

"Why, you shall give me—but we'll talk of that down-stairs; I've a little something, and such a glass of Madeira!" Saying this, the housekeeper hurried Madame Spanneu from the apartment.

An hour at least had elapsed, and I, with the other perquisites, was carried to the housekeeper's room; where I could not but recognise the potency of the Madeira. Mrs. Pillow's face was luminous; Madame Spanneu's eyes twinkled; and a gentleman, whom I at once discovered to be Mr. Curlwell, was chewing a bit of a song, in which there were "Chloe's eyes," and "Chloe's lips," and "Chloe's balmy kisses."

I am Purchased by Madame Spanneu.

"Well, my love," cried Madame Spanneu, for wine had enlarged her heart, and deepened her ordinary terms of affection,—“well, my love, if I've any weakness in the world, it's music."

"That's me, all over," said Mrs. Pillow, with a slight titter, and as I thought, an oblique half-look at Mr. Curlwell. Whether it was so or not, that gentleman took a deep respiration, and again burst forth in praise of "Chloe."

"And when does Lady Blushrose come back, my love?" inquired Madame Spanneu, between one of Curlwell's pauses.

"Bless your heart, nobody knows. She's a-going to bury herself from the whole world. Poor dear thing!" Thus sympathised Mrs. Pillow.

Mr. Curlwell, leaning back in his chair and putting his thumbs in his waistcoat, roared over his neckcloth—"She'll be at Ranelagh in a fortnight."

"La! how can you talk so? And with that dear child upon her mind! To be sure, she knew as how it wouldn't live, if she didn't nurse it. Well, it's in Heaven," cried Mrs. Pillow with an air of satisfaction, in no way lessened by another glass of Madeira. "I don't know how it is: between ourselves, people haven't the hearts they used to have when I was a girl."

Madame Spanneu was about to press her lips to the glass: struck by this melancholy verity, she paused an instant: then, shaking her head with deep significance at the housekeeper, she cried, "They haven't," and tossed off the Madeira.

"The world's a-getting still wicked," was the opinion of Mr. Curlwell—"nobody now can trust nobody. I never thought much of the Countess. Some people says she's handsome: but she's not my beauty." Here, the valet looked dead in the face of Mrs. Pillow, who, with the corners of her mouth slightly curling—said "You're so partic'lar."

"Poor thing! Still, you know, my dear," cried Madame, "now the baby's gone, the Countess must have something to like."

"Try a poodle," said Curlwell; "for my part, I hate a house with babbies."

"Well, what a man you are!" exclaimed Mrs. Pillow, smiling. "But after all, people with the money of the Countess can't feel grief like us as are poor."

"They haven't the hearts," cried the valet in a loud voice, expanding his chest.

"With a good deal of money, folks can bear a deal of trouble, and be none the worse for it," said the housekeeper.

"Trouble does 'em good—teaches 'em who's master," vociferated the valet, and again he drank the Earl's Madeira.

"Still, my love," said Madame Span-neu, "I pity the Earl; everybody says, my dear, he's so much feeling."

"Not a atom," exclaimed Curlwell; his charity towards his superiors fast vanishing with his sobriety. Indeed, I have no doubt that the valet's firm belief was that all human goodness had for ever quitted the drawing-rooms of the great and set up its "everlasting rest" in the butler's pantry. Thus, he continued, "The Earl feel! Pooh! Crocodiles, ma'am—crocodiles."

An Illustration of Human Motives.

"But really, Mr. Curlwell," said Mrs. Pillow, "what motives, as we may say, should his lordship have—"

"How do we know? Motives! Who knows anything about 'em? I don't trust to anything or anybody: if the Earl was to give me five hundred a year to-morrow, should I thank him for it in my heart? No: and why not? Why, because I should be certain he'd some motive in it. Nobody does nothing without thinking of something." Such was at once the simple and enlarged philosophy of Lord Huntingtopper's valet.

"My dear Mr. Curlwell, I do think you're right. I'm sorry to say it: but something happened only yesterday at our house, that makes me suspect everybody; yes"—said Madame Spanneu, with emphasis—"everybody."

"Can't do better, ma'am," cried Curlwell, again quaffing the Madeira. "What was it?"

"Why, you know, my dear Mrs. Pillow, we lost our darling cat three weeks ago."

"Dear me!" cried the sympathising housekeeper.

"Well, my dear, about the middle of last week a woman—a very tidy, civil sort of body, comes to our house, and says to me, says she—Marm, do you want a cat? Why, my dear, says I, quite forgetting who I was talking to—I do. Well, then, says the woman, here's a sweet little cretur; and with that, she does no more than take a black kitten out of her basket, as she had under her cloak. There, said she—there's a little rose in June for you; black as a coal, ma'am; search it all over, for I wish I may die if there's a white hair in it. Well, my dear, I'm not superstitious; no, I should hope not; still there is luck in a black cat. So I says to the woman, you're very kind; I'll take the cat with pleasure: it's very good of you to have brought the cat. Don't name it, marm, says the woman; who would take no thanks at all for the matter. Well, I took in the cat, and the woman goes away. You'd see nothing in that, would you, my dear?"

"Nothing at all," said Mrs. Pillow.

"Cat was mad, no doubt," cried the charitable Curlwell.

"Not at all; as sensible and as well-behaved a cat as ever entered a decent house," averred Madame Spanneu. "But what do you think, my dear? Yesterday comes the very woman to me again. Marm, says she, I hope you like the cat? Very much, my dear, says I. You'll find it a beautiful monser, marm, for I know its family. I've no doubt of it at all, says I. Well then, says the woman, since you like the cat so much, we can now come to business. What business? says I. Why, marm, says the woman, as I brought you the cat, you couldn't do less than let me serve it? Serve it—serve it with what? says I. Why, with cat's-meat, says the woman. Couldn't think of such a thing, says I, as I always feed my cat from my own table. Then you should have heard her impudence! Why, says she, calling me everything but a lady, I could have got the kitten a place in a respectable family, yes, a place in a square—and you never could be such a fool—yes, my love, those were her very words—you never could be such a fool—could never know so little of life, as to suppose I'd give you a kitten, if it wasn't that I was to serve her with cat's-meat."

The Story of a Feather.

"Like all the world," says Mr. Curlwell: and here ended Madame Spanneu's chapter on human motives.

I am of Madame Spanneu's Stock.      Gossip of Gowns and Cloaks.
Short History of a Scarlet-Heeled Shoe.

WHEN I next saw the light, I found myself among the cast-off finery which formed the stock in trade of Madame Spanneu. There I was, in tolerably good company to be sure; but with fallen companions; with degraded silks; cashiered taffeties; expelled satins; velvets, thrust for ever from the society of the great. Nor was I alone—a solitary plume. There were feathers, thick as snow-flakes, upon Madame Spanneu's shelves. Thus, though at first I felt a sinking of the spirit—though, as I remembered my former glory, when I nodded above the baby prince, I felt a sort of sickness from the close, musty atmosphere about me, I soon became reconciled to my condition. Indeed, there was great jollity among us. For two or three nights—for it was only at night that the talk and fun began—I and my companions maintained the dignity of sulks. We were, however, speedily laughed into good temper; and then we ourselves laughed with the loudest. Every day Madame Spanneu added to her stock: thus, every night gave us fresh matter of enjoyment. We were wont to receive the newcomers as hardened jail-birds welcome culprits on their first captivity; grinning them out of their sorrow; jesting them into obduracy. Indeed, so hardened, so reckless was I become, that had I been selected for the head of even Garrick, I do not think—such is the infection of lawless company—I should have been sensible of the abasement.

The Story of a Feather.

I am not about to reveal the secrets blabbed by my companions ; but this advice, my love for mankind—badly as I have been treated by the race—compels me to give. Never, gentle reader, so long as you have a stitch about your anatomy, believe yourself alone. If thoughtless people could only know what their left-off clothes say about them, sure I am, they would resolve upon one of two things : either to reform their lives, or to go naked. Let no man harbour a black spot in his breast, and believe that his waistcoat is wholly ignorant of the stain. Let no man drop an ill-gotten guinea into his pocket, and think the poke unconscious of the wrong. His very glove shall babble of the bribe that has burnt his hand. His cravat shall tighten about his throat, if that throat be seared with daily lies. Ignorance of man ! to believe that what is borne upon the body has no intelligence with the moral good or evil dwelling in the soul ; to think that the purple of a Dives knows not the innermost arrogance of its bearer ; that the rag that flutters upon Lazarus breathes not the sweetness of a May-day blossom. I know that people who believe themselves courageous thinkers, may call this a superstition. I will not argue it ; but I will say, there may be worse. However, it is perhaps well for poorer men that the rich put no faith in such bigotry ; for if folks were once assured that their cast-off garments could reveal all the deeds and speculations of the wearers, great, indeed, would be the man who could afford to give away an old coat ! No : we might have even prime ministers and kings' conscience-keepers burning their clothes in their bolted bed-chambers, cautiously and secretly as a gallant burns his Paphian letters the night before pistols.

The stories I heard whilst on the shelf of Madame Spanneu made the white down upon me stand upright as the down of a thistle. How the gowns were wont to discourse ! How the short cloaks would giggle with merriment ! How the very gloves would lisp their little adventures ! Nay, there was a high scarlet-heeled shoe—an odd one,—can I forget the story with which it would make every gown and petticoat heave and flap again with laughter, as it told—and we had the story with every newcomer—the curious incident by which, in a scuffle, it lost its fellow ! This shoe was a very old shoe : it had been in the possession of Madame Spanneu's predecessor, flung aside amongst other odds and ends, and having for many years outlived the fashion, and being in a state of widowhood, had no hopes of returning to the world again. Hence, the great delight of this scarlet-heeled shoe was to prattle all the scandal it could remember, and, I believe invent, of the sphere from which it was irrevocably banished. Nay, often the shoe would receive a smart reprimand from a peach-coloured satin, which would declare itself ready to turn red at the absurd prattle of "the old wretch," that would extend its sides with laughter, mocking the censure. Then, I remember, there was a grave, long-trained pompadour that would continually beg to know what the scarlet-heeled shoe took them for; adding that its fittest place, after what it had seen, or professed to see, in this naughty world, would be a convent, and to go the rest of its life down-at-heel in penance for past iniquities. At these rebukes the shoe would laugh immoderately, its high, glowing heel rapping, in a spasm of merriment, against the shelf it lay upon. The worst of it was, the shoe would never let any other companion tell its history: the shoe insisting that the narrator had, in the course of the story, determinedly omitted various matters which the said shoe, with more loquacity than charity, would insist upon supplying. There was, I particularly remember, a darling little smoke-coloured satin-cloak, trimmed with death-black lace—a beautiful, quiet, modest thing, that Diana herself might have worn of nights, when she slipped out to chat with Endymion;—well, the envious shoe would never let the smoke-coloured cloak tell its story. Five successive nights it tried hard to do so, but still the shoe would so pervert the motives of the cloak—would so minutely finish particulars, where the cloak merely intended a general sketch—would so insist upon Dutch painting, when the cloak, for reasons of its own, merely wished an outline of the faintest chalk—that at length, the patience of the cloak was worn out, and the tender little thing in a rumple of passion that astonished a very staid lutestring—a late Lady Mayoress by-the-bye—began to use its tongue so rapidly, and to call such names, that there was a general rising and shaking of gowns to smother the invective. I particularly remember, too, that a pompadour, with all the majesty of the court of Louis Quatorze, begged the smoke-coloured cloak, if only for the sake of other ladies, to remember that "there were feathers present." And then there was a sudden hush—and then a murmur—and then whispering sounds, in which, however, I clearly distinguished the words—"don't know where it may go to"—"wretches of men"—"amongst all sorts of people ;” and then, for the first time, a sense of my equivocal position came upon me. I then felt myself as belonging to no party. To-day, I might be in the head of a chaste and gentle countess, to-morrow, in the hat of some masque-hunting, unprincipled gallant. I could not but acknowledge the prudence of the pompadour. I felt myself a kind of being of a harem ; endured, but never to be taken cordially into confidence. I own the thought saddened me ; but I was speedily drawn from myself by the loud, saney voice of the scarlet-heeled shoe, who cried—“Feathers be fiddled ! I don’t care what they hear ! So swear away, little smoke-colour ; say your worst, my darling ; and then let me try if I can’t beat you !”

The cloak, folding itself in dignity, deigned no answer ; and for a time, there was a pause, only interrupted by the low, malicious chuckle, and witch-like snigger of the scarlet-heeled shoe. I hope, however, that without being treasonous to my trust, I have sufficiently warned my beloved female readers. Again and again let me tell them, there is peril in silk—there is danger in satin—yea, jeopardy in a bit of riband. When they are assured that cast-off gowns can babble—that cloaks can give tongue—that gloves may turn a secret inside out,—nay, that I have known even the tag of a stay-lace stab a reputation,—when they know all this, let them be the “silver lining” of the silken clouds that float between them and the world, and in the innocence of their thoughts, defy the gossip even of those who have most closely known them.

Ere, however, I quit this part of my subject, I cannot refuse to myself the desire of giving, in the words I heard it—ay, more than twenty times—

The Short History of a Scarlet-heeled Shoe.

The shoe speaks.

“Once upon a time—for I shall give no other register—there was born in the English court a beautiful female child. She was the daughter of a king’s minister ; but whether the first or the tenth, what does it matter ? I have heard it said, however, that it was the minister (whoever he was) who first put a tax upon shoe-leather ; for the which, if there be any truth in history, the punishment of corns was first sent down upon high people.

“This child was christened ; and great was the revelry at the baptism. All the fairies then in England—for upon some huff or other the greater number of the good folk had quitted Britain, flying, like a flight of swallows, from a cliff of Dover, like the swallows no one knew whither—all the fairies who were too old to travel, and so were left behind, came to the christening ; and according to their custom, as shown in many histories, brought an especial gift of goodness for the little suckling. One brought the voice of a nightingale—one the grace of a fawn. One the simplicity of a lamb—one the gaiety of a kid. And then she had all sorts of fairy clothing ; with a good gift and a blessing worked in every article. In truth, she was clothed from top to toe from the workshops of the good people. She wanted nothing—nothing but shoes. They had been forgotten ; and great—great was the sorrow of the fairies ; for unless the baby were instantly shod, and that by fairy hands, it was doomed that the child should go barefoot all its life. Unseemly and most uncomfortable would this have been to the beautiful daughter of the minister of the king. Everybody was in grief, and everybody asking everybody what was to be done : when an old woman, where she came from nobody could tell, appeared in the court, carrying myself and my little sister, both of us then of baby size. ‘Here,’ said the strange old woman—‘here, an it please you, are the shoes !’ But all the fairies cried out witch—hag—devil,—and swore by all their fairy rings, by moonlight, and by whatever else the good people hold solemn, that the babe would be lost, if suffered to wear the old woman’s shoes. What, however, was to be resolved ? Either the child must have the shoes then provided, or go barefoot. Now bare feet for the daughter of a minister of a king was not to be thought of—the child might as well have been born a gipsy-beggar. Whereupon the king’s minister rose, and with a passionate voice cried—‘Put on the shoes, put on the shoes !’—and immediately all the fairy-folk vanished with a howl ; leaving the little old woman to fit her gift upon the child.

“Wonderful shoes were we ; for we were no sooner on the feet of the minister’s daughter than we became fixed as her flesh, growing hour by hour, and day by day, as her feet grew. And so we grew, and so we agreed, for about seventeen years. It was impossible that there could be a more loving pair of shoes. We were always whispering in each other’s ears ; kissing one another ; and behaving with the greatest closeness of affection. This lasted for seventeen years : and then, I know not how it was, a sudden aversion arose between us—and, in the end, we never felt so happy as when we were apart.

“At length, it matters not how, I lost my companion, and the minister’s daughter, in grief, in misery, died. She had received every good gift, but all was as nothing; what was each virtue under the sun, when a beldame fairy had bestowed upon her wrangling, slipping shoes?"

This was the story of the Scarlet-heeled Shoe. I heard it over and over again; but never without sounds of anger, contempt, or scorn from the gowns, cloaks, and stomachers about me.

Madame Spanneu's Customers. Their Humility. Domestic Peace and Pickles; an Episode.

DURING my sojourn with Madame Spanneu, I had frequent opportunities of considering the various characters of her customers, who—I confess I was at first astonished at the discovery—were many of them most genteel and easy-going people; and, indeed, in their own esteem, a parcel of the very best society. Still, whatever was their bigoted opinion of their own worldly consequence, their visits to Madame Spanneu gave pleasant proof of their humility of spirit, inasmuch as they all came to habit themselves in the left-off garments of their betters. And this humility was the more christianlike, inasmuch as I verily believe that many of the purchasers would have gone to the stake in cast brocade, rather than have confessed to the meekness which induced them to buy it. They were, it is true, lowly of heart, but would not for the world have had the virtue made public.

How often have I seen the gown of a peeress carried off by the wife of a tallow-chandler! How often has the cloak of an earl's daughter been doomed to the shoulders of the spinster of two rooms! Nay, the Countess's gowns—the rustling perquisites of Mrs. Pillow—I saw no less than three of them sold to buyers, whose brassy looks and bold voices made me tremble for the future destiny of the garments. And can I ever forget the cold chill that struck through me when I once felt myself taken up by such a customer, who blew through me and shook me, and—my heart of pith sank at the words—inquired, “How much?” Madame Spanneu, with a just estimate of my virtues, asked a good round sum, and thanking my stars for my escape, I felt myself dropped from the hand. “Feathers, Jemima, darling, isn’t the thing; no, my rose-bud, they isn’t indeed.” Thus spoke an old gentlewoman—dear Mrs. Gaptooth, as Madame Spanneu called her—to the girl, who desired to make me her own; but the reproof of the matron, though uttered in the calmest, most maternal voice, appeared by the very force of its sweetness—or certainly by some force—to convince Jemima. She sighed, pouted a second, then seemed resigned. “Gals of your tallness, Jemima, don’t carry off feathers well; they makes you gawky; and in this wicked world, looks is everything.” I was quite charmed with the appearance—the manner of Mrs. Gaptooth. I thought I had never seen so venerable a woman; and even while she spoke of the necessary shows of life, she discoursed in so passionless a tone—seemed to have so just a value of all the fleshly vanities of the earth, that she appeared to me a kind of lay saint; a creature, doomed by the imperfection of human nature to eat, drink, and sleep, but at the same time never forgetting the passing value of mere mortal beauty, when most beautiful. “Ha! Madame Spanneu,” the dear old soul would cry, “beauty, as I often says to my gals, is a flower—a tulip, Madame Spanneu; a painted tulip; now, a flourishing in a bed, and now on a dunghill.” “True, my dear; very true—beauty,” Madame Spanneu would reply—“doesn’t last as it ought, not even with the best of us.” “Ha! my dear Madame Spanneu, the beauty I’ve seen come on and go off—beauty! it’s like a guinea, Madame Spanneu; when it’s once changed at all, it’s gone in a twinkling. That satin, by candle-light, Jemima, will be worth any money.” And thus Mrs. Gaptooth—who was a frequent visitor at Madame Spanneu’s—would discourse before her daughters, as I concluded they were, from the maternal tenderness which she would shed upon her mingled talk of the outward loveliness of humanity, and the glories, sold at second-hand, by Madame Spanneu. For Mrs. Gaptooth herself, I must repeat I had the very deepest respect. Charming, easy, loveable old woman; her eye had such a soft, half-slumbering look; her voice came like the gentle breathing of a flute; she always walked as if she trod a church-floor, and seemed fed on nothing coarser than marmalade and honey. As for her numerous family of daughters, I must confess I have often wished they had been a little more like their mother, for they, it must be said, were too often loud, self-willed, and frolicsome. But be it understood once and for all, that I write from the impressions of characters and scenes as they at the time fell upon me.

Mrs. Gaptooth on one of her visits came alone. Madame Spanneu, who was always with us, received the dear old creature in her show-room. One of Madame's young women—for there were two or three assistant sempstresses in the house—was present; and the conversation was carried on between Madame and her visitor in so low a voice that I could only catch here and there a few words. I was convinced, however, that Mrs. Gaptooth spoke of Lord Huntingtopper with the air and manner of an acquaintance. "There's no accounting for taste, Madame Spanneu," said Mrs. Gaptooth in a somewhat piteous voice, "but where she's got to, I'm a sinner if I know." "And you've come to tell his lordship as much, my dear?" "Certainly not, Madame Spanneu. Lord Huntingtopper's coming here to-day to see your husband—Mr. Curlwell told me as much—so I'm come just to throw myself promiscuously into his way, that I may know a little more about the business. One can't be too safe."

Thus much I could piece out from the low-voiced colloquy of the ladies. Madame Spanneu, was, however, fidgety under the restraint of a third person, and so told the young woman to go down-stairs, and see that those nasty dogs did no mischief. The girl being gone upon her delicate mission, Madame Spanneu talked freely. "Well, I did hear that Lord Huntingtopper was going to marry Lady Dinah Willoughby."

"What of that, my dear? Why shouldn't he? But after all," said Mrs. Gaptooth in her mild, matron-like way, "who knows if the fellow's serous."

"No doubt of it," responded Madame Spanneu; "he must be in earnest, for he's bought her ladyship a poodle; Julien's teaching it all sorts of things. Ha! Mrs. Gaptooth, men are nice creatures they are," cried Madame Spanneu with bitterness. Charming, however, most charming was the charity of Mrs. Gaptooth, for she gently clasped her hands, twisted her thumbs, and a smile gilding her broad quiet face, she cried—"Poor fellows! silly things!" and then she chuckled, gently chuckled.

"Don't talk in that way, my love," said Madame Spanneu, "it makes my flesh crawl to hear you pity 'em; it isn't standing up for your sex. Ha! you don't know what I've to suffer."

The Story of a Feather.

"Anything new?" asked Mrs. Gaptooth, with that peculiar serenity which characterises the interest of some people in the misfortunes of their neighbours.

"New!" exclaimed the wife, and she closed her eyes, gave a spasmodic shake of the head, and seemed to swallow a rising emotion. Then there was silence for a moment, and then Madame Spanneu, with an alacrity that appeared to do her heart good, cried,—
"But, my dear, I'll tell you all about the villain."

I had not yet seen Monsieur Julien Spanneu, for his wife rigidly enforced his seclusion to his own room, and, as she would say, to his fittest company, his filthy dogs—his pupil poodles. I had, however, heard more than enough of him; and had formed in my own mind his outward man from the notes which proceeded from his fiddle as well as from himself: for really, they were so eternally blended, that man and fiddle seemed but one instrument. I have heard men declare that they have only to hear a voice to immediately fit it with an anatomy; albeit the fleshy instrument from which the voice is heard shall, in its reality, be in every point a contradiction to the body which has been, by the fancy of the listener, bestowed upon it. I suppose this habit of men, not only when hearing persons but also when hearing of them,—this custom of endowing them with flesh and blood of some sort, arises from the difficulty that poor human nature has to consider mind in the abstract—to think of the human soul, without head and shoulders, legs and arms. Be this as it may; I had—from a too-frequent overhearing of Monsieur Spanneu—made him a present of a long, thin, lizard-like body, a face sharp as a blade-bone, twinkling eyes, grinning jaws, and a back bending like a willow in a breeze. His voice came with a cutting scream, far above his catgut. Hour by hour I heard him raving, stamping, singing, fiddling, at his canine pupils, withal so passionately, so earnestly, with such apparent consciousness of the importance of his function, of the great social value of his teaching a dog to go on three legs at the word of command—to limp as if wounded—to tumble head over heels—to feign the last mortal agony—and, above all, to toss a sixpence from its nose, at any given number,—that whatever might have been my opinion of the value of Monsieur's labours, I could not but respect the amount of sincerity, of real heart,

Domestic Peace and Pickles.

he put into them. Then, how he would vociferate! How he would scream—"Chien que tu es,"—as if in his indignation he told the dunce of a dog a startling truth, and then as the gender might be, crying, "Chienne que tu est," as the worst opprobrium he could wreak upon a female learner. With these things fresh in my mind—for Monsieur Julien kept them day by day smarting like a new sore—I listened with all my ears to the coming narrative of Madame Spanneu, perceiving that—like a good wife as she was—she never felt so truly happy as when she could convince a dear female friend, who promised to keep the imparted secret locked for ever in her breast, what a villain she was married to.

When Madame Spanneu, as I have observed, promised Mrs. Gaptooth such happiness, the matron, decorously preparing herself for the pleasure, merely said, "Do."

"Well, my dear," begins the injured wife, "you recollect that creature, Louisa?"

"A very fine gal," answered Mrs. Gaptooth with some vivacity. "Beautiful flaxen hair, and eyes as blue as blue chaney. Where is she, my dear?"

This question Madame Spanneu did not answer, but waiving it with a real or affected shiver, kept to the story of her wrongs. "And you know, my dear, that I'm a little particular in my pickles?"

In the name of the mummy of King Cheops—certainly one of the best preserves of the earth—what can there be in common with domestic wrongs and domestic pickles? This question stirred me, but not Mrs. Gaptooth. She evidently felt there was nothing inharmonious in the matter; for had she been a statue made to speak, she could not with more tranquillity have answered,—“My dear, I do.”

"I'm not a proud woman, Mrs. Gaptooth; no; my worst enemy, my dear, if I have such a thing, can't say that; but I'll turn my back upon no woman for pickles. No; if I can stand upon anything in the world it is my onions."

"Very true, my dear," was the corroboration of Mrs. Gaptooth. "But the gal?"

"Well, my dear, I was called to Leatherhead for a week, to see my aunt in the jaundice. She got over that, but she can't live long, my dear, and whenever she goes, there's something for us. Well, there was I, out a week from home, I may say, upon business; leaving that Louisa to keep the house. When I came back, there wasn't a walnut—a bit of cabbage—not a single onion, my dear, if you'd have died for it."

"And all with Louisa?" asked Mrs. Gaptooth.

"My love," cried Madame Spanneu, most affectionate in her wretchedness.

"My love, I afterwards found out she'd been altogether—yes, altogether—mistress of the house; and so the wretch had not only destroyed my peace but devoured my pickles!"

Monsieur Spanneu and his Scholars.

I am Ill-used by a Poodle.

DEAR Mrs. Gaptooth felt for the double calamity of Madame Spanneu all the sympathy of a sister. The heart of the matron, upon her own grave assurance, bled for her friend; albeit, no woman ever sat above a bleeding heart with sweeter composure. "It's a bad world, my dear," said Mrs. Gaptooth, "but we're in it—we're in it, and must make the best of it." With this expression of philosophy, the old gentlewoman quitted the room, followed by Madame Spanneu.

I had that day been turned over and over by several hands, and had been carelessly thrown upon a chair, the price Madame Spanneu placed upon my beauty being considered too extravagant by those who came to purchase. I confess it, my situation became irksome to me: I longed once more to be in the world: I had had sufficient of retirement, and yearned for society. Whilst these thoughts possessed me, one of Monsieur Spanneu's poodles frisked into the room. The little beast was a most mischievous and volatile animal, despite the daily lessons of a master to correct the vices of the canine constitution. He was never so happy as when gnawing the edge of a carpet—jumping up and tearing at the maids' aprons—biting the cat in the nape of the neck—and, in fact, committing every licence within the wicked powers of puppyhood: a more irreclaimable little dog was never born to the luxuries of life. As the poodle entered the room I felt a strange shudder. Ho came in with a light, cautious air, treading on the very tips of his toenails, and lifting up his jet-black nose, as though he snuffed delicious mischief somewhere; then, in very self-abandonment, he chased his tail, spinning round like an opera-dancer. Then, tired of the sport, he approached a table with sudden seriousness, and staring full at a blue riband or cap-string, twitched the muslin on the floor, and in an instant buried his head, fighting it the while with his fore-paws, in the cap itself. Never did a dog seem more delighted—never was puppy so completely caught by a cap. At length, by the very force of his admiration, the poodle tore the cap into strips, and sated with that peculiar pleasure, looked round about him for another victim. It was but an instant, and I was in the poodle's mouth. That I, who had helped to decorate the Prince of Wales, should be made the plaything of a dog! I felt that my last moment was come—that my ignominious end was near. How the poodle snapped at me and tossed me! Then dropping me on the floor, he barked and barked at me; and then, after a momentary pause, he caught me up in his mouth and ran with me out of the room. In another minute, the heedless puppy, unseen by his master, carried me into Monsieur Spannen's academy; for there was the Frenchman, kit in hand, playing the Menuet de la Cour to a couple of poodles, stamping, vociferating, swearing, whilst he played.

I have no doubt that the action of the Frenchman had sudden operation on the fears of the animal that had carried me off; for the dog crouched under a chair with me between his paws, now pulling me through his teeth, and now contemplating in curious silence the motions of his canine school-fellows. I have little doubt, too, that a somewhat ponderous whip, which the Frenchman remorselessly applied to the backs of his students, had its due effect upon the transgressing poodle; for as the whip cracked, and the culprits yelped and howled, the poodle trembled throughout every hair, and yelped in sympathy.

It was, however, delightful to witness the affectionate manner with which Monsieur Spannen inflicted punishment on his students. "Ha! ha! mon mignon," he would cry, and the thong would wind round the darling's body with force enough to crack it. "Viens, mon ami," the master would exclaim, at the same time kicking the pupil to the other end of the schoolroom. The teacher divided his time between soft, endearing phrases and hard thwacks.

Monsieur Spanneu and his Scholars.

His lips dropt oil, but his hand still bore a whip.

The poodle having left me beneath a chair, although I was somewhat flustered by the rough treatment I had received, I nevertheless soon recovered sufficient composure to look about me. I then noted, what I have since a thousand times remarked, the difference—even to extremes—between a man in his reality and a man as we may, in our imagination, have painted him.

Here was Monsieur Spanneu, a short, obese Frenchman ; yet surely never did man carry so much fat so lightly. He was about four feet six in height, with a face ample as the moon at the full, a broad forehead and bald head, its mudity half discovered by a nightcap half-slipped from its resting-place. Nothing could have been more ludicrous than the aspect and manner of the teacher, had they not been redeemed by an energy, a certain enthusiasm of purpose, that imparted to him something like dignity. It was impossible to laugh outright at Monsieur Spanneu; the earnestness of the teacher would repress the giggle of the scoffer. It is true he taught nothing but dogs; but then he convinced you that there were no creatures on this earth so worthy of teaching. "A dog," Monsieur Spanneu would say, "is de only true friend of de man," and this opinion the master would dignify by laying the whip about the only friend of our species.

Whether Monsieur Spanneu's pupils were more than ordinarily dull, or the master himself more than usually irascible, I cannot determine; but never during my stay in the house had I heard such crackings of the whip, such yelpings and howlings from the dogs, as whilst I lay unseen beneath the chair, a witness of the discipline of my host. Monsieur had arranged his pupils for a cotillon, when, after the sweetest evidence of temper on his part,—after the master had twenty times called to the dogs, "mes petits," "mes amis," "mes mignons," "mes enfans,"—after he had lavished upon them all sorts of endearing syllables,—he lost his benevolence, and seizing his whip, went in among the pupils and laid about him like a thresher.

It was at this moment, when the very tiles of the housetop were ringing with the howling of the dogs, and their master was raging like a tempest, his face scarlet, and his forehead streaming with passion, that Madame Spanneu rushed into the room, ceremoniously followed by Mrs. Gaptooth.

"Monsieur Spanneu, I'll put up with this nuisance no longer," cried Madame; and if ever woman looked in earnest it was the wife of the teacher.

Monsieur Spanneu was instantly composed. He stooped to pick up the nightcap which in his energy had dropped from his head, and folding it delicately, tenderly, between his hands, he suffered a smile to break all over his face, and bending with graceful devotion, he said—"Ma belle Elise." There was nothing in the words. Any other husband might have called his wife his beautiful Eliza, but in the manner of Monsieur Spanneu there was the devotion of a life. Never was there such fealty paid to the wedding-ring. I saw it at once; the poodles, whatever were their sufferings, were fully revenged by the wife of their tyrant and teacher. The meekest, poorest dog there, was a lion in heart and independence before Monsieur Spanneu, compared to Monsieur Spanneu before his wife. Hence, the husband met the ferocity of his helpmate with nothing more than a deprecating bend of the back, and "Ma belle Elise."

"None of your nonsense," cried Madame Spanneu,—that lofty-minded woman rejecting what the weakness of her sex might have deemed a compliment. "I won't have my house turned into a kennel any longer. The dogs shall pack; and all the better if their master packs with them."

"Mon ange!" cried Monsieur Spanneu, his meekness, if possible, increasing with the violence of his wife.

"Yes, you're a pretty fellow to call anybody your angel, you are; I'm none of your angels, I can tell you,"—exclaimed Madame Spanneu, with a vigorous tossing of the head.

"Now, my dear," said Mrs. Gaptooth, apparently from the best spirit in the world, "now, don't go on so—though, to be sure, so many dogs must put any house in a most terrible pickle."

"Pickle!" cried Madame Spanneu, with intense shrillness of organ: "pickle!"

"Ma chère," said the husband with a lost look, as though that one word pickle had conjured about him a throng of terrors which he felt it was in vain to struggle with. Had Madame Spanneu not been the poor man's wife, she must have pitied him; as it was, pity was the last feeling to be wasted on the destroyer.

"Pickle!" for the third time screamed Madame Spanneu, and I could perceive as she moved from the door, that her husband shifted himself, preparing to make a retreat. "I wonder that the floor doesn't open and swallow you at the word," she cried.

"Ma belle Elise!" said the Frenchman, but he spoke in vain.

"I wonder that you can have the impudence to exist—you, that I have given house and home to—you that I harbour, with your filthy curs—you that—"

The Frenchman was about to fly, when casting his eye about, he observed me lying tumbled and bitten beneath the chair. The poor man turned ghastly pale when he saw me. He was at once assured of the ill-behaviour of one of his dogs, and of the increased abuse that must fall upon him, should his wife discover the accident. He must suffer anything, rather than permit the chance of such disclosure: hence, with false courage, he approached the chair beneath which I lay, and seating himself, so arranged his legs as to keep me out of sight.

And then Madame Spannen began again to abuse her husband, whilst he—poor man!—began to tune his fiddle.

Again did the wife call out, "False, vile wretch!—miserable Frenchman!" whilst the Gaul, affecting philosophy, drew his bow, and sang—"Nous n'avons qu'un temps à vivre."

A Husband's Wrongs.

A Listener.      An Attack.      Triumph of Colours.

AND STILL did Madame Spannen exercise her voice to her husband's fiddle, albeit little mollified by the conjugal cat-gut. Orpheus—it is a trite tale—tamed lionesses by the magic of the gamut. Monsieur Julien Spannen was not an Orpheus; neither was his beautiful Eliza a lioness; hence the discord and the music continued for some minutes, and threatened to endure, when the maid jiggged into the room, and announced the name of

Mr. Curlwell. At the sound, Mrs. Gap-tooth observed in a confidential voice to Madame Spannen,—“From my lord, I'm bound for him,” and hastened away to seek the valet. “Come for Lady Dinah's dog, I'll be sworn,” cried Madame Spannen, with a fiery glance at her husband, “and you're never in a state to see anybody. How the man sits! Why don't you run and clean yourself, you outlandish savage?”

“Ma belle Elise!” cried the Frenchman, sitting cross-legged before me, with a shuddering dread of my discovery.

“Why don't you get up?” shrieked the wife.

Monsieur Spannen affected a sudden spasm—worked his nether jaw, moped and mowed like a monkey, and then ventured to ask his wife if she had no sentiment?

“Sentiment!” echoed the beautiful Eliza, as though insulted.

“Mon ange,—I am sick—malade—horriblement malade. Allez chercher du cognac—oh! if you have religion, get brandy:" and the Frenchman ground his teeth, and, rocking from side to side, with both his arms hugged his abdomen.

The Story of a Feather.

"Brandy!" exclaimed the wife, with mixed contempt and derision at the extravagance of the sick man, and was about to leave the room. This was precisely what the husband wanted: he therefore sought to hurry her with sweetest phrase. "Ha! C'est bien, ma vie—mon trésor—mon âme." Then seeing his wife suddenly fixed, he roared—"Get brandy, or I will die—I tell you, belle Elise, I will die."

"Do you promise?" inquired the wife, with evident interest in the question; and then, with a laugh, she swept away from the moribund man. For an instant the sufferer sat listening to the footsteps of his spouse descending the stairs, and then he jumped up, and plucking me, rumpled and disordered, from beneath the chair—cried "Ha! si cette diablesse vous avait vue!" Saying this, he rapidly buttoned me under his waistcoat, and again fell in the chair—again sick, expiring for the life-bestowing brandy. He listened, but there was no wife hurrying back with the restorative anodyne. Yet, certainly, she would come—yes, she would never let him expire. That was her rushing step. No; it was the cat at romps. Had he not promised to die if brandy came not? Still silence? It was plain the wretched woman wished to try if he would keep his word. Smitten with a sense of this truth, the mournful spouse rose from his chair, and drawing forth his handkerchief, was about to use it in search of a tear of wounded sensibility, a tear that might be in his eye. He hesitated, and the majesty of an offended husband coming to his aid, he exclaimed—I cannot for a certainty say what, but sure I am, it was not "Ange." Whatever it was, the word by its energy seemed to carry the man from the room, and he ran muttering down-stairs, carrying me as his bosom companion on the way.

I verily believe that Monsieur Spanneu, having descended his own staircase, was about to enter his own parlour; he, however, brought himself dead up at the door. I heard voices within; so, it was plain, did Monsieur Spanneu; for after pausing a minute, his heart commencing a hurried beat, he bent his ear close at the keyhole. I must confess that, for a moment, I wished I could have been turned into a living hedgehog, that I might have inflicted on the bosom of the offender a thousand pricking reproofs of the meanness of the act. I could have curled and twisted like a snake with very indignation, as the Frenchman, grasping the handle of the door, seemed as he would screw the entire of his ear into the compass of the keyhole. How, at first, he shook and quivered at the voices within—and then, with an attempt at calmness, he set his teeth and slightly grunted as he listened! Nevertheless, with all his industry and quickness of ear, Monsieur Spanneu was only enabled to catch half-sentences; these he pieced together, making thereof a terrible scourge by the very ingenuity of his ignorance. I, having the acute organisation of a bird, could recognise sounds of softest volume, and was, therefore, excessively amused at the jealousy which Monsieur gathered from the mere fragments he was enabled to put together.

Requesting that the printer will set in different letters—will, if I may use the conceit, put certain words in a whisper—I will endeavour to show what Monsieur Spanneu heard, and what escaped him. The proverb that “listeners hear no good of themselves,” is evidently worked out in this way: the good, if ever spoken, is spoken in so weak a voice that it falls dead ere it arrives at the keyhole. This was doubtless the case with Monsieur Spanneu.

“I never thought that his lordship could have so liked that Madame Spanneu,”—here begins the inaudible type, for words inaudible to the husband—(“to know all about her ladyship.”)

“But, bless you, he so loves her—so doats upon her; (and as Lady Wiltoughby has a fine fortune, perhaps she deserves it.)”

The first voice I immediately recognised as the silvery property of Mrs. Gaptooth; the second as the masculine organ appertaining to the valet Curlwell.

“Well, there’s no accounting for love, to be sure; and so his lordship comes here for a dog to show his love! Mrs. Spanneu tells me everything! La! how she grins at her husband—(though, do you know, I think she doats upon him after all.)” Here the gentlewoman laughed: not so Monsieur Spanneu; for his rage rising, his knees began to knock against the panel of the door. Every moment I expected to hear a voice from the room cry, “Come in.” The speakers were, however, too much interested to take heed of a light disturbance, so the half-lost dialogue, to the further misery of Monsieur Spanneu, went on.

(“I must say his lordship takes a great deal of trouble about pleasing her ladyship.”) Why doesn’t he run off with the woman at once?

“Why not? I’m sure she’d jump to have him: (and as for buying dogs, and all such fal-lals—it’s child’s work, Mr. Curlwell; it is, indeed.)” Here, again,

The Story of a Feather.

Mrs. Gaptooth laughed ; and again the knees of Monsieur Spanneu smote the panel. Almost breathless, the forlorn, self-tormenting husband again essayed to listen, yet heard but fragments. Thus the dialogue was continued.

("But about that gal, Mr. Curlwell ? If his lordship, as you say, is really in love with the widow, why should he care for that gal ? You don't know the trouble she's give me.")

("You're an excellent woman, Mrs. Gaptooth, and I scorn to deceive you.") I've only used his lordship, as his lordship's used the dog—as a sort of blind. (He cares nothing for the feather-dresser ; he's never seen her.) It's I as loves her," answered Curlwell, and Monsieur Spanneu gasped again.

"Impossible !" cried Mrs. Gaptooth.

"Not that I can say, love ; but you know what I mean. I don't know how it is—but I—I will have her, and there's an end of it," cried the valet.

"Sacre !" groaned Monsieur Spanneu.

"Well, I like a man of spirit," said Mrs. Gaptooth. ("I'm sure I've done all I could to rummage her out. She went from her last lodgings, nobody knows where. There was a talk about an old pothecary ; but I believe nothing about it.") And now, Mr. Curlwell, why should you deceive an old friend ? Why should you tell me it was his lordship as loved the woman, and not your proper self ?"

"Good reasons, Mrs. Gaptooth ; the world isn't what it ought to be, or I should have as much money as them as carry their heads among the highest. It's a wicked world for poor men, me'm," said the valet with a sigh.

"Well, well, the world's not so bad, after all," said the philosophic matron ; "we may know a worse."

"Je l'espère," muttered Monsieur between his teeth, and again with gaping ear he listened.

"But you're rich enough for her," cried Mrs. Gaptooth : "and it shan't be my fault if you don't make her a happy cretur."

"I will, Mrs. Gaptooth—I will, as I'm a man," exclaimed the valet with energy.

Here Monsieur Spanneu with a sudden roar burst into the room. He uttered no syllable, but with a spring brought himself to the fire-place,—to his own sacred hearth—and caught up the poker which, save himself—for at that moment he had dreadful thoughts of his wife—was its brightest ornament.

Mrs. Gaptooth, being a woman, slightly screamed. Mr. Curlwell in short spasmodic sentences inquired—
"Hallo ! The man mad ?—Murder to be done ?—Blood to be shed ? Brains to be knocked out? Killed like a dog?"—And uttered other household expressions of household alarm. Monsieur Spanneu felt too much to speak. "His voice was in—the poker." Seizing that weapon, he commenced an attack upon the valet, who, shaking many years from his heels, ran round and round a table, the injured husband—like Othello, injured only by false suspicion—following him. Mrs. Gaptooth, selecting the easy chair, sank in it, evidently prepared at any moment to faint. Still did Curlwell describe the circle of Monsieur Spanneu's mahogany, which was happily of sufficient area to protect the valet from the avenging iron of the short and corpulent Frenchman, who, nathless, ran round and round, making at times the hardest blows upon his own hospitable table, blows inhospitably intended for the brain-pan of his guest.

An Attack. Triumph of Colours.

However, mortal breath could not long sustain the trial, and at length Monsieur Spanneu, gasping again and shaking his head at his imagined wronger, dropped the poker despairingly upon the table. At the same moment, Curlwell paused, and with his knuckles resting upon the same piece of household utility, took wind. There they stood, panting at one another, like two dogs in July on the opposite sides of a ditch. Seeing them powerless for any mischief, Mrs. Gaptooth then felt it her duty as a woman and a Christian—as she afterwards said to Madame Spanneu—to scream the roof off.

Down rushed Madame Spanneu, in full dress. She had, in truth, retired to her chamber to decorate herself for an audience with Mr. Curlwell; and not, as her husband foolishly imagined, pour chercher du cognac.

Strange, mysterious are the movements of the human soul! Arguing from common examples, does not the reader imagine that the very sight of his wife at such a moment would have been as oil to the Frenchman's jealous flames? It was otherwise. For in an instant, Monsieur Spanneu, crying, "Ma belle Elise! mon ange! mon âme!" locked his helpmate in his arms.

Now Madame Spanneu was dressed in a blue lutestring, trimmed with white satin. "Had it been any oder colour," Monsieur afterwards declared, "he would have cast de traîtresse away—for ever away; but dat gown vas his weakness. He could not tink to lose her ven in de vite and blue!"

In a word, the Frenchman struck to his wife's colours.

UR last chapter left Madame Spanneu in the arms of her husband. In less time than a leaf of this small history could be turned, the lady released herself from that sweet bondage; and that, too, with a decision that flung her helpmate, sounding, against the wainscot. Never did woman more vigorously illustrate the fallacy of that vulgar saying, that man and wife are of one flesh; for never was division more clearly manifested.

"My heart is broke!" exclaimed Monsieur Spanneu. That his ribs also were not fractured was a mercy and an astonishment. The husband looked entreatingly at his wife—there was no responsive glance—and, in another second, the wretched man had seized his hat, and stood the statue of despair upon his own door-step!

In that moment, active was the great fiend: for twenty little imps, the devil's footboys, rose about the Frenchman; some crying halter—some poison—some climbing his shoulder, and gently whispering in his ear, razors; and some again, with a sweet, diabolical smirk, pointing their fingers in the direction of the Thames. Monsieur Spanneu instantly resolved on death. What place but the grave for a broken heart? He would die: his only difficulty was the choice of means. Thus, hanging, poisoning, drowning, abscission of artery—one and all of these modes recommended themselves; but their merits appeared so equal, that the Frenchman was too much puzzled to choose. He at once broke from the besetting difficulty, by—turning into an alehouse. Distrusting death, he rushed to drunkenness. Monsieur Spanneu drowned his reason twenty fathom deep; but with wise reservation kept his clayey self safe from the coroner. Never was the inexperience of man so shockingly displayed; for almost before Bacchus could have winked, the Frenchman was disastrously drunk. This great evil was attributable to his temperance. He had never, poor man! taught himself the use of the bottle, and, therefore, the exposure of his ignorance was sudden and complete. He had been wont to dally with water, qualified with sugar, for luxurious tipping, and now stood he beside that burning Lethe—gin!

Have I not heard the story? Is it not Æsop's? The story of a stag, that drinking at the stream, still murmured at the shadow of its antlers? In like manner did Monsieur Spanneu drink and drink,—yet see nought within his glass but an exaggeration of his wrongs,—wronges shadowed from false thoughts that thronged his head. Hence, the Frenchman—the gin distilling from his eyes—would drink and cry—“traîtresse,” “cocu,”—“cocu,” “traîtresse,”—and then, in the very idleness of despair, sing forth the snatch of some infidel song defiant of love, and satirical of wedded truth. Thus, the wretched husband passed with greatest facility through all the degrees of drunkenness, until he was in a state of professorial imbecility. He cried, laughed, raved—became maudlin, and then affectionate with his own hat, calling it “Ma belle Elise,” then dashing it to the end of the room with new disgust; and then, some pause allowed, whistling—or spluttering a whistle at his foot, as throwing it up and down he swore it was his favourite poodle dancing a jig. At length, passion would shift no longer; and so, worn out, the poor Frenchman sat in his chair, a very skin of gin, and snored.

Let it not be thought that Monsieur Spanneu was solus. By no means. He played his various antics to the rejoicing shout of the customary visitors of the Horse and Anchor, many of whom witnessed the growing inebriety of a Frenchman with the same zest and curiosity with which they would have made drunk a monkey, a dancing bear, or any other animal endowed with certain powers imitative of some gestures of humanity. These true-hearted Britons, in the pride of patriotism, considered it something like impertinence, conceit, in a Frenchman to get beastly drunk; it was very like a liberty in a foreigner. Therefore, they manfully marked their censure of the circumstance, by filling the offender's pockets with soot, by blackening his face with the same substance—whilst an indignant wag emptied the mustard-pot upon the Frenchman's skull, telling him, to the glee of the party, that yellow hair became him beautifully.

These insults the Frenchman felt not—knew not. Gin had done its best and worst; and he sat, the world spinning with him—the breathing block of a man. He had, however, paid what was called his reckoning; and being incapable of swallowing another drop, the landlord of the Horse and Anchor—a humane man—thought it best to have the drunkard carried home: the sot himself having, in his frantic cups, published, again and again, the whereabouts of the particular fireside where, in his own tragic words, he had been stabbed “in de vitals of his peace.” A hackney-coach was called, and the Frenchman carried by the waiter and boots from the room, the company therein roaring “Rule Britannia,” as the foreigner was borne to the vehicle. “All right—you’ll know,” said the waiter to the coachman, the driver being very imperfectly instructed in the dwelling-place of Monsieur Spanneu. “A Frenchman—you’ll find out,” bawled the waiter from the steps of the tavern, and the coachman, with, as I thought, a fine faith in the doctrine of chance, persuaded, by dint of voice and whip, his horses to gather up their legs, and move funereally on.

How far we went I know not; but the day was waning, and it grew darker and darker; and the coachman—strange to say—more and more impatient. “Is this it?” he would cry, stopping at a house, and thrusting his head into the coach; and once or twice Monsieur Spanneu, deep in his dreams, would answer something which the driver insisted upon interpreting as a negative, and, therefore, bellowed an oath—asked himself why foreigners didn’t stay in their own country—whipped his horses anew—and still went on.

In the course of our journey, the coachman stopped at three houses, insisting that Monsieur Spanneu was the master of each of them, and that he had nothing to do, but to get out, undress himself, and go to bed like a Christian.

My belief is, that Monsieur Spanneu had every desire to resign himself to goose-feathers. More, I am half convinced that—whilst in the coach—he thought he was at home, and once more smiled upon his forgiving wife. For he kissed, ravenously kissed, the tips of his own fingers, and muttered, “Mon ange!” Then, I am sure, thought he of his peaceful bed and of preparation for repose therein; for he unbuttoned his waistcoat, and I fell into the straw at the bottom of the coach. At this moment, the coachman roared some unintelligible words—the Frenchman grunted some unintelligible answer—and the coach stopt. With great alacrity the coachman leapt from the box, and thundered—knocker in hand—at a door.

“Here’s master again!” cried the maid.

“I wish I was in my grave!” exclaimed the mistress.

Hereupon, after some delay, a light was brought, and the maid came to the coach, and the driver was about to lift out his passenger, when the girl screamed out, “La! let him be—this isn’t my master, but somebody else’s.”

Again the coachman was compelled to mount the box—again to drive on. Again and again he stopped; again and again he knocked at doors. Again he said, “Gen’lman drunk!” the domestic published to the house, “Here’s master again;” and again the mistress thereof wished herself out of this most comfortable abiding-place, into her grave.

Even the patience of hackney-coachmen may pass away. This truth I learned on the third appeal to the third knocker; for the driver, on being for the third time assured that Monsieur Spanneu was “somebody else’s master,” lost all self-restraint—all philosophy. He roared like a satyr; and coupling the most disrespectful words with the immortal essence of Monsieur Spanneu, swore that he would cause that essence to evaporate to a very ungentle and, doubtless, disagreeable locality, unless the Frenchman would instantly, and in the very best English, declare the house where he might lawfully and conjugally put on his nightcap. It was very strange; but the fervour of the coachman acted upon the drunken man like a bucket of cold water. For a moment, and a moment only, the soul of Monsieur Spanneu—or rather sense, for as pigs and goats may get drunk, the soul can have nothing to do with that very popular operation—came back into its proper place, wherever it may be, with all its wits about it, prepared to consider anything that might be demanded of it. I am sure that a momentary excess of reason may be wrought out from an excess of drunkenness; in the same way that a momentary spark, a fire, may be struck from out the cold, cold flint. Thus, when the coachman laid hold of Monsieur Spanneu, and with certain circumlocutory phrases, insisted upon a straightforward, and most direct, and most reasonable response, Monsieur Spanneu sat bolt upright, opened his eyes and mouth, and looking more sensible, and articulating the English language better than I had ever heard him before, made answer, at once satisfying the driver as to the truthfulness of his reply.

Dissatisfied is man ; for no sooner had the coachman learned what he had been an hour and more vainly seeking for, than he uttered phrases very condemnatory of not only the intellect but the eyes of his passenger, and with renewed vigour, plied the whip. In a very short time the vehicle was drawn up at Monsieur Spanneu's door.

Again the coachman knocked, and the door opened ; again he spoke, in tones as though he had brought some new luxury home—"Gen'l'man drunk."

"It can't be master," cried the maid ; Spanneu never having before offended. She had scarcely uttered the words, however, when she rushed to the coach, and in amazement cried—"Why, missus, if it isn't !"

I then heard Madame Spanneu very distinctly wish herself in the grave.

The coachman inquired if "he should bring the gen'l'man in ?"

I heard not the answer, but the driver took the Frenchman in his arms, and carried him towards the house, leaving me a waif, astray upon the world in the bottom of a coach. The door still remained open.

"Men are brutes, my dear," said Mrs. Gaptooth.

"Lay him on the door-mat," said Madame Spanneu.

I again Meet Patty Butler.

HE coachman drove to his stand; where, with the patience of his tribe, he sat meekly awaiting another call. I heard a church clock strike ten; immediately afterwards, a sharp, shrill female voice cried "coach," and the driver instantly opened the door, and handed in a woman, who bade him drive to some street, for the name escaped me, in Bloomsbury. The woman, as it appeared to me, was under some strange excitement; for now she giggled, and now again she sighed heavily, and now she cried, "Well, well, he can't last for ever,"—and with that consolation, laughed outright. In the midst of this, she let fall her handkerchief, and stooping to feel for it, her hand caught me. How her eyes sparkled, as she held me to the window, and by the dim lamps in the street, scrutinised my shadowed beauty! "It can't belong to the coachman," she said; and immediately concealed me. From the brief glance I had had of my new possessor, I did not feel particularly hilarious at my destiny. She was a woman of about three or four and twenty, with an animated face, but withal a certain vivacious boldness of the eye, unpleasing to the sobriety of my constitution. However, she had taken possession of me, by right of discovery. I was, to her own satisfaction at least, her lawful property.

The coach stopt in a narrow, dark street, opposite a mean-looking dirty house—a house with all the outward indications of squalor and disrepute. I may be fanciful, but there is a physiognomy in houses—at least, such is my belief. Sure I am, I have seen houses with a swaggering, hat-a-cock sort of look; whilst other habitations have seemed to squint and leer wickedly from the corners of the windows. The house the coach stopped at was of this kind; my heart fell as my new possessor gently struck the knocker. “You’ll give more than a shilling?” said the coachman, with an affected air of wonderment. “A shilling is your honest fare—and as an honest man you can ask no more,” was the feminine reply. “Honest man!” muttered the coachman, as if the woman talked of something altogether out of human experience. “Yes, honest man!” answered my new owner,—who continued to press me closely under her arm, ringing honesty upon every note of her shrill, quick voice. At length, the coachman mounted his box in evident disgust at the gibberish he had been compelled to listen to; for his departing growl was “honesty,” with no supplementary compliment to that very respectable virtue.

“And here you are agin, Mrs. Cramp!” cried an old withered woman, as my new mistress entered the house. “And I hope you’ve enjoyed yourself?”

“Not at all,” answered Mrs. Cramp, with sudden ill-humour.

“Well! that is a bit of beauty!” exclaimed the old woman, as Mrs. Cramp laid me upon the table. “How much did it cost?”

“Got it quite a bargain,—I may say for next to nothing. And how’s your lodger, now?” said Mrs. Cramp, with an evident wish to withdraw me as the subject of conversation.

“La! what do you think? Well, wonders will never cease. It’s only half-an-hour after you went away, when a gentleman comes here, and inquires about her. I thought there was some tale in that pale face of hers. Well, when he found out that she was the lost sheep he’d been looking after he went on like mad. He told me, as soon as she got well, he’d marry her, and make a lady of her—and more than that, putting a golden guinea in my hand, he told me to let her want for nothing.”

Here Mrs. Cramp drew herself up, saying—“Mrs. Crumpet, I knew I was right! Though I never clapt my eyes upon her, I knew she couldn’t be any better than she should be.”

“Well, well, we’ve all our little faults,” said the charitable Mrs. Crumpet. “But I hav’n’t told you all. Besides the guinea, the gentleman went away, and in his own pockets brought back two bottles of wine ; and told me not to spare it, for there was plenty more where that come from. So, my dear Mrs. Cramp, we'll take a little glass, just to drink the poor thing's health."

"I have no objection to wish the gentleman health ; but as for your lodger, we don't know who's who," said Mrs. Cramp.

"Oh, she's a sweet, quiet little pigeon," cried the benevolent Mrs. Crumpet ; and her thin, yellow face, shone with a smile like new gold. The wine was produced ; the glasses filled, when a knock at the street-door called the landlady from the room. In a moment she returned. "It's only Becky ; but she says Mr. Cramp won't be pacified with any lies they can tell him—he's doing nothing but screaming for you."

"Well, well, he can't last for ever," was the self-comforting answer of the wife. She then took the glass, and saying, "Here's the gentleman's health, whoever he is," emptied it. "Well I suppose like the girl in the play, I must take off my finery and be Cinderella again," said Mrs. Cramp, and she rose to leave the room.

"You'll find everything as you left it," said Mrs. Crumpet, who, during her mistress's absence called in Becky, and glorified her with half a glass of wine. "I suppose you don't get much of this sort of stuff with your master ?" said Mrs. Crumpet. The girl made no answer ; but gave a melancholy shake to her head ; drank the wine, and heaved a deep sigh. "And has the old fellow made much of a rumpus ?"

"He's been doing nothing but praying and swearing these two hours," said Becky.

"Well, Providence is very good," said Mrs. Crumpet ; "there's one good thing—he's bedrid."

"That's the only blessing," said Becky, "for we can have the comfort of shutting all the doors and letting him hallo."

More conversation of this consolatory cast took place ere the return of Mrs. Cramp. At length she entered the room ; but what a change ! She had thrown off every vestige of her finery, and was drest with scarcely more pretension than the smutch-faced, blowsy maid-of-all-work, who had come to fetch her. "You'll take care of the things—and of that particularly," said Mrs. Cramp, pointing me out to Mrs. Crumpet.

"Like the apples of my eyes," answered the landlady with emphasis. She then took the candle, and preceded her visitor to the street-door. "Good night, my dear Mrs. Cramp; let us hope for happier days."

"Yes! he can't last long," again repeated Mrs. Cramp; and lightened by such comfort, I heard her trip quickly past the window, followed by Becky. Mrs. Crumpet returned to the parlour, and setting herself at the table, whereon was still the wine, divided her admiration between the bottle and myself. "Well, they ought to bless their stars as are born to such things," said Mrs. Crumpet; her heart evidently softening under vinous influence. She continued to soliloquise. "Ha! with such fine feathers, what a fine bird I should have been? And now—the Lord help me!—I let's lodgings to all sorts." Then, for new solace, did Mrs. Crumpet again address herself to the wine, which still increased its kindly operation. She took me from the table; shook me; blew through me; and then began to hum the songs of her youth. For some minutes she said nothing; but sure I am her brain was busy with the past; with the glowing, radiant hopes which had faded into leaden-coloured realities; for after a time, she dropt me upon the table, and in a deeper key exclaimed confidentially to herself—"And now I let's lodgings!"

At length, Mrs. Crumpet rose, and placing the bottle affectionately under one arm, she carried me, a wine-glass, and a candlestick from the room, with, as I soon perceived, the intention of ascending the stairs. This operation, after some difficulty, she effected; and in due season I arrived at the door of one of the garrets. As Mrs. Crumpet opened the door—I know not how it was—but the candle fell from her hand, and was extinguished. With wonderful presence of mind—I might even say with an intuitive instinct—Mrs. Crumpet held fast the bottle.

"Who's there?" cried a low, gentle voice—the voice of suffering. Instantly I recognised it; a tremor thrilled me. It was the little feather-dresser, Patty Butler. "Who's there?" again she asked, in darkness.

"They do make such candles now!" cried Mrs. Crumpet; and she groped for the lost treasure, which with some difficulty she regained. "I've a tinder-box in the cupboard; for at my time of life I can't get up and down stairs as I used to do." Saying this, Mrs. Crumpet, with extraordinary facility, took the box from the shelf. Here, however, began a difficulty. Mrs. Crumpet endeavoured to strike a light; but by some accident neither flint nor steel would meet. Sometimes the stone jagged one set of the striker's knuckles—sometimes the steel the other. And thus Mrs. Crumpet sat and struck, and struck, but no spark came!

The Story of a Feather.

Oh, wine—wine—Bacchus—Bacchus! Here, in a wretched garret, with an old crone of a landlady, was thy subtle wickedness made manifest! How often does excess of wine prevent the spark that might otherwise have cast its radiance far around! How often has the genius, drenched with grape, done nought, when working hard to scintillate, but blindly strike his own knuckles!

"The rain must have come in upon the tinder," said Mrs. Crumpet, "and more than that, I've cut my fingers all to mince-meat. Well, well, people at my time of life oughtn't to do nothing. O dear," she cried in despair—"the flints they make now-a-days!"

"Give it to me," said Patty, "I am sure I can get a light."

"You! bless the dear child!" cried Mrs. Crumpet, and vigorously she struck and struck, until striking her knuckles past patience, she flung the steel and flint upon the bed where she had thrown me some minutes before. "Well, if you will have your way, you must," cried the landlady, and she pushed the tinder-box, as I thought, towards Patty.

In a minute, Patty sat up in bed. Once or twice she struck the flint; then she was seized with a cough, which compelled her to desist. Again she essayed. Surely there was some truth in the saying of Mrs. Crumpet; the flint was bad—worn out; its fire quenched. Again and again Patty struck. And now the sparks come thick! It is plain, the rain has spoiled the tinder. No; it kindles! Patty—I had been thrown almost within a hand of her—blows the spark; the fire casts a red hue upon her face, but yet I see the change. How wan—how thin—how much more like her dead mother!

The candle is lighted, but the exertion has proved too much for the girl. She coughs and coughs; and exhausted, yet with such sweet mildness in her eyes, her face, she sinks back upon what her landlady would call a pillow.

I looked round the garret. Oh, God!

Mrs. Crumpet, and Patty.

Cramp, the Card-maker.

My first introduction to Patty had made me acquainted with the gloom and wretchedness of a London garret. I was, nevertheless, startled by the extreme misery about me. The room was rather a nook, a hole for useless lumber, than a place for a human being. The landlady, a little woman, could scarcely stand upright beneath the slanting roof; the gusty wind shook the small latticed window, and entered through broken panes, defying the rags and paper thrust therein to keep it out. In a corner, on the bare floor, was the bed or mat; and there, beneath a web of a blanket, lay Patty Butler. Poor thing! After my first surprise, I took a sad pleasure from her wasted face: I heard sweet music from her feeble voice. They are changing, I thought; happily changing. A few more heavy days—some few restless, fevered nights, and that poor creature, dowered with the gentlest, purest spirit, will smile down upon the injustice and iniquities of a world that now casts her, like a useless weed, into its foulest places.

As I continued to gaze upon her, I felt a strange curiosity to know her history since we last met. There was something more than the pain of sickness in her face. Was it shame? I asked; and immediately felt mean for the suspicion. Had her affections been snared by heartless device—or had she, secretly, nurtured a love that, in its very hopelessness, consumed her? Yearning for sympathy where the world would sneer and mock at the desire, had she, in dumbness, suffered that inward bleeding of the heart, whereof more die than coroners dream of? There was a sad story in that shrunken face. The history of the world is made of battles—conquests—the accessions and the deaths of kings—the doings of statesmen and the tricks of law. This makes the vulgar story of the external world. Its deeper history is of the hearts, even of its lowest dwellers—of the ennobling impulses that swell them—of the unconquerable spirit of meekness which looks calmly upon terror, and turns even agony to patience. A London alley might produce a more glorifying heraldry—if emotions could be quartered—than Poitiers or Blenheim. How many a man, whose only history is written in a baptismal register and undertaker's account, has conquered suffering, stronger in its onset than a squadron! If true magnanimity awarded knighthood, how many who want even shoe leather, have won their spurs!

With these thoughts passing in me, I continued to contemplate the poor girl before me. She lay wholly exhausted by the effort of striking the light; whilst Mrs. Crumpet, with characteristic consideration for the weakness of her lodger, attempted not to disturb her, but with due self-preservation, fortified her own system with a glass of wine—with another—and another. This done, she spoke.

"Well, I'm sure, my dear, if you'd only have let me know that you had such a friend about you, do you think I'd ever have put you in this room? Bless you! child, what do you think I'm made of? You might have stayed in the other apartment."—(This, I afterwards found, was only the next garret, but then the casement was whole; the bed was of decent flock; it had more than one blanket, and had the elevation of a truckle.)

"Thank you, this will do very well," replied Patty, with an effort: "very well—for my time."

"As I'm a Christian, you sha'n't sleep here another night," answered Mrs. Crumpet, with vivacity. "No: I promised the gentleman to do all I could for you, and my word's my bond. Well, if you don't remind me of my dear lost child, Maria!" Here the landlady wiped, as she thought, a tear from her eye, and again lifted the glass.

"What gentleman do you speak of?" asked Patty, with a concerned look.

"There! now, if I hav'n't blabbed; and I promised never to say a word about him! But he is a gentleman—a real one; nothing sham in him, my dear: and more than all, you've only to get well—and ha! ha! why you look better while I talk to you, and you've a colour in your face that a duchess might give her ears for!—Well, as I was saying, you've only to get well, to be made a lady of."

Mrs. Crumpet and Patty.

"Pray tell me—pray do! Of what gentleman do you speak? I know no one—no one, who"—and, excited by the manner of her landlady, Patty lay incapable of further speech; and her heart—I was sure of it—fluttered like a bird.

"Come, child," cried the gossip, "you're faint—only a little faint. I've brought you some wine; a glass—one little glass—will make you alive again."

"I thank you—none—none," said Patty feebly.

"But you must, my love; you shall, my darling," exclaimed Mrs. Crumpet, and she stooped towards the bed, with the bottle and glass. "There," she cried, filling—"and if I stay here all night, you shall, my angel, drink it."

Patty cast a helpless look towards the landlady, and then resigning herself to the necessity, raised herself in bed. She stretched her hand towards the glass, and already had the liquor at her lips. "Ha!" chuckled Mrs. Crumpet, "if the gentleman who brought that wine for you, could only see you now!"—Patty instantly withdrew the glass, and in a faint, yet determined voice, said—"I will not taste a single drop."

"But you must, my cherub," cried Mrs. Crumpet, with renewed vigour.

"Not a drop," repeated Patty, "until you let me know to whom I am to owe it."

"Fiddlesticks!" exclaimed the landlady; "that you'll know some day, and that shortly, if you'll only make yourself well and hearty. Come, drink the wine, child."

"No," said Patty, with calm purpose, and she placed the glass upon the floor.

Again and again, Mrs. Crumpet tried to prevail, but Patty was obdurate; she would not taste the wine until informed of the donor. This knowledge Mrs. Crumpet refused to communicate: let me, however, do the poor woman justice. I verily believe she would have hesitated not a second to gratify her tenant, but for one circumstance; she had not the means. She was as ignorant of the benefactor who had left the wine and money, as was Patty herself. She, therefore, with the cunning of an experienced gossip, thought she might guess the person of the stranger, could she only know her lodger's previous history. This she had often endeavoured but in vain, to learn. In the present instance, she determined to make an indirect levy upon Patty's gratitude ; and, therefore, resolved to impart to her the history of Mrs. Cramp in advance for Patty's own. To this politic end she bent her discourse.

The Story of a Feather.

"Well, my dear, I don't know if you ar'n't right. But who'd have thought that anybody so young should have such caution ? Ha ! if my good friend Mrs. Cramp had been like you ! You've seen Mrs. Cramp, my dear ?"

"I have heard you speak of her," said Patty, whose thoughts were plainly far away from the subject talk of her landlady.

"To be sure ; I'd forgot — you've never seen her. Well, she was here to-night. She's been to a rout of some sort, and so she was obliged to come here to dress."

"To dress?" said Patty languidly.

"Bless you, yes ; I keep all her fine things for her. You see, she's married to a man forty years older than her ; and though everybody thought he was dying when she had him, he's only beginning to die now. Well, although he's as rich as king Solomon, he won't let his wife have a decent rag upon her. And so, poor soul ! there's nothing for her but to cheat her husband right and left."

"Cheat him—her husband ?" asked Patty.

"And as, by good luck, he's bedrid, why it's cheating made quite easy, my dear. The worst of it is for poor Mrs. Cramp, although she's heaps of fine things, she mustn't wear them in her own house. There, she must look no better than a cinder-wench ; or else the old villain might go out of the world with malice in his heart, peril his own precious soul, and cut the wife of his bosom out of his will. Well, my dear, that would be dreadful, wouldn't it ?" asked Mrs. Crumpet in a tone that peremptorily called for an answer.

"Yes," replied Patty, almost unconsciously.

"And so to hinder that, whenever Mrs. Cramp goes out, she comes here to dress, and then comes back and shifts her finery for her old clothes to go home in. That's tricking the miser, isn't it ?" cried the landlady, with a laugh.

"Doubtless," answered Patty.

"Now, here's this beautiful feather," and Mrs. Crumpet took me up, "she's bought it quite a bargain. But do you think she might show it to old Cramp ? Bless you, she might as soon take a crocodile into the house. Well, thank goodness ! the old villain has his reward. Bless you, his conscience must be as full of holes as a cullender. The devil's always at his bedside, that's one comfort."

Cramp, the Card-maker.

"What do you mean? What crimes has the poor man committed?" asked Patty.

"Why, no crimes in partic'lar, as you and I should think 'em: only you see, he made all his money by making packs of cards. Now, in his old age, he's turned so shocking religious! You'd never believe it; but he thinks he's haunted by all the Kings and Queens he ever passed across his counter. He vows they all peep in and gnash their teeth at him through the bed-curtains; and once—you'd ha' died a-laughing to hear him, for 'twas nothing but the fleas, my dear—once he swore he was bitten all over by the Jack of clubs."

"Poor man!" said Patty.

"Ha! if poor Mrs. Cramp had only known him afore she married! And that brings me back to what I was going to say, that it was so proper in you not to take the wine afore you knowd who sent it."

"Then you will tell me?" asked Patty.

"To be sure, I will, when you tell me how it was that you, with such friends, should ever have wanted anything. How was it that you came in such a pickle to me? Without a farthing—without a—"

"My story is not worth the telling—is nothing," said Patty.

"La!" cried Mrs. Crumpet, unconscious of the truth she uttered, "there's nobody as hasn't a story, if they knowd how to tell it. You must have had comforts about you?"

"I have found friends—dear, kind friends, in my worst afflictions," answered Patty. "When my mother died, and I was left homeless, I found a home."

"And why did you leave it?" asked the landlady, "afore you found a better?"

"Because I feared I caused unhappiness, where I would have given my life to have given joy. Oh, so good a man—so kind—with such a gentle heart towards everything!"

"Was he a married man, my dear?" asked the landlady.

"He was," answered Patty; whereupon Mrs. Crumpet looked suddenly very sagacious, as though by inspiration she had solved the problem.

"I see," said she; "you and the wife couldn't agree. The woman was——"

"Kind—excellent—most kind," cried Patty, with animation—"but weak and passionate."

"And jealous, of course?" added Mrs. Crumpet.

"I saw that my presence gave pain to her, and I left her house, determined, whatever might be my portion, to keep my hiding-place a secret from herself and husband."

The Story of a Feather.

"But he has found you out," said Mrs. Crumpet.

"Mr. Lintley?" cried Patty.

"And has brought wine and left money for you?" for Mrs. Crumpet immediately concluded that the stranger must be the apothecary. "What say you to that, child?" asked the lady.

Patty could say nothing. She was silent and in tears.

An Intruder. A Stolen Watch.

Patty in New Affliction.

“It doesn’t delight my heart to see you cry,” said Mrs. Crumpet; “’twill do you good, my lamb—it always did me good when I was young. Ha! they don’t make the bottles as they used to do!” she added, perceiving that all the wine was gone—a discovery which the wine she had already drunk scarcely enabled her to compass. “That’s Mr. Abram,” she cried, as a loud knock at the street-door rang through the house. “He’s always in such a hurry! Good-night, my darling—go to sleep, and dream yourself a lady.” Saying this, the landlady managed to pick her steps from the room, in her vinous forgetfulness leaving me behind.

Heavily the hours passed. Poor Patty! I heard her lips move—heard her turn restlessly in bed—moan and sigh, as though her little heart was vainly struggling with its sorrow. “’Twill soon be over”—I then heard her murmur in a sweet resigned voice—“very soon:” and then she slept.

How I wished myself in the hand of some good fairy! Some beneficent sprite, piteous of human wrong and human suffering! Then, I thought, should this dark, dim garret pass away! Then should rise a small, quiet nook of a place, nestled among trees, and carpeted with green around. And there a brook should murmur with a voice of out-door happiness—and a little garden brimming over with flowers should mark the days, and weeks, and months with bud and blossom; and the worst injuries of time be fallen leaves. And there, health in balm should come about her path, and her mind be as a part of every fragrant thing that shone and grew around her. And thus,—poor, wearied creature!—she should draw her daily, gentle breath, till ripe for heaven.

I had fallen into a delicious lull with these thoughts, when I was startled by a sudden uproar, proceeding from the lower part of the house. There were loud, blaspheming voices—the shrill cries of a woman,—and on the following instant, the garret-door was burst open, and a man rushed in. As he did so, his head struck against the low roof, and he fell with a heavy weight upon the rotten floor, swearing and cursing with half-smothered passion, which it cost him a hard effort to control.

“What’s that? who’s there?” exclaimed the terrified Patty.

“Nobody—silence—where’s the window?” replied a voice, gaspingly. The window was in a second opened, and the intruder, I could perceive, endeavoured to escape by it. The aperture was too small for his big, burly anatomy, and there for a brief space he remained with his shoulders wedged in the narrow space, swearing and groaning—and then, on the sudden he was silent, and again and again I heard his hard breathing, and felt the garret shake as he strove to effect his purpose. The noise increased below, and coming steps and voices convinced me that the fellow was closely pressed. For a moment he paused, as to collect and intensify his energies for one last dreadful effort—for one gigantic struggle: another instant, and he had cleared the window. As he did so, I thought I heard a heavy substance fall upon the floor.

Almost immediately upon the escape of the intruder, the garret was filled with watchmen and others, carrying lanterns; Mrs. Crumpet, upon whom sleep and surprise had induced a beneficial sobriety, now bustling through, with a loud voice, declaratory of the wondrous honesty of her habitation, and of all the lodgers therein dwelling. Everybody paused at the window. “Abram’s gone—the bird’s flown,” said a man, who, I imagined, was in higher authority than his followers.

“’Tis impossible, Mister Hardmouth,” said a watchman; “a moral impossible out of this winder. Why, it isn’t no bigger than a rat-hole.”

“Ha, Snigs, don’t you yet know what a man will do with Jack Ketch at his heels?” answered Mr. Hardmouth. “Well, better luck next time,” said the philosophic functionary. “But I tell you what, Mrs. Crumpet; the parish of Bloomsbury will give you a taste of Bridewell, if you don't keep decenter people about you."

"Me! Mr. Hardmouth! I'm a peaceable woman, and never troubles my head with my neighbours. I'm a woman as pays my church-rates, and can look the queen herself in her face! My husband could have bought and sold you all,—every jack of you,—but he's in heaven." And Mrs. Crumpet continued to spin off this old, homespun sort of yarn with practised volubility; at the same time, as I observed, that she carefully covered a watch which had fallen from Mr. Abram in the hurry of his departure, and which lay beneath the window. This operation she very adroitly effected; and then continued her self-assertion of punctilious honesty, the while with her foot she pushed and slid the watch close to Patty's bed.

"And who's here?" cried Hardmouth, taking a lantern from a watchman, and holding it towards Patty, who cowered and trembled, with blushes in her face that seemed to scorch her. For the first time, I saw within her eyes a look of scorn, of passion. Her hands shook together, as she appealed to the landlady, "Will not these men go?"

"To be sure they will—never fear 'em, my love," cried Mrs. Crumpet, seating herself upon the edge of the bed. "And if they won't, I'll never leave you; never, my darling."

"And so this is Mrs. Abram, is it?" asked Hardmouth. "Poor thing! Well, with all her husband's luck upon the road, he might house her better."

"She is no Missus Abram; nor nothing of the sort. Don't cry, child, they're brutes; a waking honest people in their beds. I should like to know when you're going?" asked Mrs. Crumpet of her intruders.

"When we've done a little more business. Off o' that, Mother Crumpet; you and I are old friends, and ceremony's lost atween us." Saying this, Mr. Hardmouth—if justice be a woman, she ought specially to protect her sex—seized Mrs. Crumpet by the arm, and swung her from her seat upon the bed. "Now, my dear, where's the traps?" asked the officer with most familiar insolence.

"I know not what you mean—not a word; but leave me—only a few minutes, whilst I rise and dress." Thus spoke Patty; and for a time she seemed to vanquish sickness by the strong sense of her offended modesty. There was a look of command in her face—a look in which were lost the care and feebleness of an hour since. "I beg—I desire that you leave me."

The Story of a Feather.

"To be sure—leave us," exclaimed Mrs. Crumpet in treble notes, and imitating, though with shrewish awkwardness, the imperative manner of Patty. "How can we dress with men in the room? Are you lost to nature, you brutes?" cried the landlady.

"Mrs. Abram can dress alone," said Hardmouth; and so saying, he twirled Mrs. Crumpet from the attic, that lady loudly denouncing the brutality of all men. Nor was she content with this; for as she stood outside the door, she called loudly to Patty, telling her to show her spirit, and conjuring upon her true womanhood, not to rise for the best man as ever walked upon shoe-leather.

Patty, however, regardless of such conjuration, dressed herself with her best speed; nor did the multiplicity or cumbrousness of her garments very much retard the operation. Her offended feelings of maidenly shame gave her strength and energy of purpose. Sickness seemed banished from her cheek; and in its place there was a look of sorrowful dignity—a mingling of grief and elevated patience.

"Come, Missus Abram, you're not dressing for the Lord Mayor's show," called out Hardmouth.

"You may come in," said Patty; and she sank upon the one chair.

The watchmen and officers again entered the garret, and again with quickened looks did Mrs. Crumpet press forward amongst them, watching with feline eagerness the motions of Hardmouth. "I thought as much," cried that wary servant of police, as he kicked aside the bedding and discovered a watch. Mrs. Crumpet, in the vigour and confusion of her wrath, nearly bit through her thumb for her thumb-nail; the watchman laughed and chuckled knowingly; whilst for Patty, she sat unmoved, and seemingly careless of all that passed around her.

"The very watch as we had information of," said Hardmouth. "I can swear to the marks. But this can't be the only egg in the nest;" and with this wise saw, Hardmouth turned over and over the bed, Mrs. Crumpet all the while abusing him, and asking him if he knew where he would go to? She then nodded to Patty, and whispered, "Never mind, my darling, for this little mishap—your friend will see you righted."

"What friend?" inquired Patty, almost unconscious of the words.

"What friend? Why, you haven't forgot the wine and the guinea I told you on?" These words brought to the mind of Patty the kind, benevolent Lintley. The recollection was again too much for her. She looked about her—at the faces hurrying around her, and smitten by the remembrance of her past sufferings—by her belief in future misery—she hid her face in her hands, and wept bitterly.

“It’s a bad job, Missus Abram,” said Hardmouth; “but if people was only to think of being found out afore they begun, why we might turn Newgate into another playhouse, and turnkeys might go a-begging. Come,” he added, “you must go along with us for this.” Patty, aghast with terror—worn with sickness—looked silently in the man’s face. She tried to answer him, but the words choked her.

“What do you mean?” cried Mrs. Crumpet in a screech, and suddenly trembling all over.

“Mean! Why, my meaning is as plain as Tyburn. This watch is stolen, and that girl—Mrs. Abram, if she is Mrs. Abram, and if she isn’t, why she ought to be—why she knows all about it.”

“I know nothing—nothing,” said Patty, with a voice lessened to whispering, by terror.

“If you don’t, man and wife is one flesh all the world over; and as it was your husband’s bed”—

“I have no husband,” cried the girl.

“Well, that’s your business, I can’t help that,” said Hardmouth.

“No one—no one—I am alone in this cruel world—alone, with none but God to help me.”

Here Patty was again convulsed in tears; whilst Mrs. Crumpet, infected by the sorrow, continued to weep, and cry, “If I had only known it had come to this!”

XXIII

A Short Account of a Highwayman. Arrival of Mr. Lintley.

THE clamour raised by Hardmouth and the watch had had its due effect upon the neighbourhood ; many of the dwellers thereabout having a most delicate, a most educated organ for the music of justice, or rather, of police. Hence, in a brief time, the house was beset by curious inquirers, anxious to learn the peculiar offence committed, whether it rose to the tragic dignity of murder, or descended to the sneaking littleness of petty larceny. Nor was it wholly curiosity that brought many to the door of Mrs. Crumpet. There were some, who, very justly indignant at the prying propensities of the watch, knew not where they might stop. "Nobody's house is safe !" cried one. "Waking honest people up in the dead of night !" cried others ; whilst a few declared, upon the responsibility of their own invention, that one of Mrs. Crumpet's lodgers had murdered a bishop on Hounslow Heath, and with a heathenish contempt of religion, had pawned the dead man's canonicals. It was, however, very creditable to the general sympathy, that everybody expressed unbounded satisfaction at Abram's escape. Much of this I heard where I lay, as it sounded from the street beneath ; and I confess my feeling of curiosity was awakened to learn something more of the fugitive.

It appeared, as I afterwards found out from the gossip let fall about me, that Clickly Abram was a mercer's man of rising reputation. He was young, good-looking, and, as the women declared, the best creature that ever broke the bread of life. Clickly, however, had this seemingly inborn prejudice—he preferred the bread of other people to the bread of his own hands. To this prejudice may be traced all the difficulties of Clickly's too short career. In the pursuit of his business, whilst measuring a delectable lutestring, he was shot dead behind his master's counter by a pair of fatal eyes, alas! too skilful in such mortal practice. Clickly's story is as old, as worn, as London stones. He was led step by step in silken chains to earn the iron fetters of Newgate. Mrs. Crumpet—I take the good woman's own avowal—had not the remotest suspicion of the highway profession of her lodger. No; it was a base, vile story. He always paid his way, and she would not believe it.

But I have left Patty wretched and desolate. She sat with a look of dreadful resignation in her face—a look that, for a moment, made Hardmouth pause, the while he rubbed his chin, and doubtingly observed, “If nothing could be proved agin her, why nothing could come of it. Though if she warn't positively Mrs. Abram—if she warn't really married to him,—why, perhaps, it might go the harder with her, because the law—though he never could find out the reason of that—supposed that a woman was under the authority of her husband.” Having delivered this, the sagacious officer was about to raise the girl from her seat, when she swooned and lay like a corpse in his arms.

“You villains! you'll murder the poor thing;” cried a woman, a neighbour, who with others had crowded into the garret, and who, with this indignant cry, rushed down-stairs.

“You'll never move her in that state!” exclaimed Mrs. Crumpet.

“She'll be better in a minute,” answered Hardmouth; and lifting the girl, as though she had been an infant, he descended the stairs, followed by the watchmen. Mrs. Crumpet for a moment stood alone in the garret, casting bewildered looks about her—and then whirling round and round in a passion of despair—she caught me up, and rushed from the attic. When she arrived at the bottom of the stairs, she found the street-door open, and Hardmouth and his party about to carry Patty from the house.

“Stop—stop,” cried the woman who had left the garret ere Patty was removed, “stop till the doctor sees her. As the Lord would have it, he was at a labour at No. 9, and—God bless him!—here comes the gentleman.” After a moment, Hardmouth turned with his charge into her parlour, and was followed by Mrs. Crumpet, who stuck me in a china mug upon the mantel-piece.

Another moment, and the kind-hearted woman, who had sought his assistance, showed my old acquaintance, Mr. Lintley, into the room. He looked cold and pinched; and I could not but observe that his great coat might have been thicker. There was an air of languor and fatigue about him; yet did the goodness of his heart, the gentle cheerfulness of his mind, sit triumphant over his looks, and he smiled as he asked, “Where is the patient?”

“Here she is, doctor,” answered Hardmouth, pointing to Patty still insensible.

“Good God!” cried Lintley, and his face changed, and he clasped his hands and compressed his lips, struggling to master his emotion, as he gazed at the feather-dresser. “How—what is this?” he asked.

“Why, doctor, you see—there’s been a little bit of highway robbery. Click Abram’s the man we want—but the bird’s flown. Howsomever, we found this in his nest, along with his wife there;” and Hardmouth, weighing the watch in his hand, nodded significantly towards Patty.

“Well, that’s not our affair,” said Hardmouth—“as I’ve said afore, if she isn’t, she ought to be.”

“Stay—tell me,” cried Lintley, and his lips trembled, and he cast a look of extreme pain towards Patty—“what is the distinct charge against this young woman?”

“Why, her husband—or as good as her husband—has committed robbery: we hunted him here, but he got clean off, leaving the girl in bed, and this watch with her.”

Lintley, with troubled looks, took the watch from the officer. I then for the first time had a full view of it. In a moment I recognised the metal chronometer sold by Shadrach Jacobs to my earliest English friend, Jack Lipscomb, and beguiled again from Jack by the potent blandishments of Miriam. And now was Patty, poor, self-denying thing, by the force of circumstances, in the deep shadow of suspicion; now was she deemed the tainted associate of vice—its companion and its comforter. I glanced again at the watch, again saw upon its dial-plate the sea-tost ship, again read—“Such is life,” written beneath it.

Arrival of Mr. Lintley.

"There must be some mistake ; I am sure of it," said Lintley with emphasis.

"Very like, sir," answered Hardmouth ; "but, you see, sir, law has nothing to do with mistakes—law has nothing to do but to punish 'em."

"Leave her with me, officer—for a few minutes, at least. Some water," and the apothecary turned to Mrs. Crumpet. "Poor soul ! she is much shattered—much changed ; but she will soon revive—'tis nothing but fainting."

After many entreaties, Hardmouth, who expressed a sort of respect towards the apothecary—having heard his virtues extolled by several women who had thronged the door—consented to leave the room, Mrs. Crumpet adding the further inducement of the second bottle of wine left by Patty's unknown patron.

Lintley administered restoratives, and in a brief time Patty became conscious of the presence of her first benefactor. She blushed, trembled, wept, yet, in her excess of agitation, felt a strange comfort that, in this new affliction, her first friend was with her.

"Tell me, Patty," said Lintley, in a calm, sad voice, "how is it that I find you in such a place ?"

"It was the best—the only place I could find shelter in," was the meek answer.

"Wherefore, and stealthily, too—wherefore did you quit my house ? Come, I must know everything," said Lintley.

"You shall, sir, everything—as though I talked to my own soul, you shall know all ;" and Patty paused as though she needed strength to proceed.

"Go on ; wherefore, then ?" asked Lintley.

"I was not happy, sir. Mrs. Lintley was not happy. I felt that my presence brought upon you disquiet ; I felt that—God pardon them !—your kindness towards an orphan girl made foolish, thoughtless people talk, and it was my duty, though I should die, to go away."

"Yet, tell me," said the apothecary, "for I must trace you step by step—tell me, what could have brought you here ?"

"I sought for work and found a little—a very little. Yet 'twas enough—I made it enough. I found, too, a kind person to dwell with ; but I was persecuted, and"— "Persecuted, child ! By whom ?"

"By a strange woman—a strange, old woman. Day after day she came to the house—I never went abroad but she followed me. I know not how it was, I felt for her a loathing I never knew for any human creature. I could not endure her. And then I heard strange stories of her ; and so that I might free myself of her, unknown to anybody, I hid here. I had not long been in this house, when I fell ill—they told me, very ill.”

The Story of a Feather.

“Ill, indeed,” said Lintley, looking with compassionate eyes at the poor wasted creature.

Patty smiled, and with strange earnestness asked, “Very ill? am I not, sir?”

“A little quiet, with careful tending, and your health will now return,” said Lintley.

“And I shall not die?” asked Patty, with sudden melancholy.

“Certainly not,” answered Lintley; “you will be an old woman yet, Patty.”

“God forbid!” cried the girl, her eyes filling with tears. “Oh, sir, do not take from me the hope which for many a day has been my sole comfort—which I have nursed, fondled, doated on—the hope of death. This may, I know, be a happy world; but, though young, I have seen enough of it. I have neither strength nor carelessness sufficient to struggle and live on as I have lived. I would wish to die. Oh, sir, indeed, indeed, I speak the truth! You know not how beautiful to me is death! What ease—what comfort—what sweet repose within a grave!”

“And is the world so barren to you, Patty?” asked Lintley. “Do not sin in such a wish?”

“Oh, sir, do not think me ungrateful. All your kindness I feel, past words to speak it. Your kindness in relieving me here—my landlady has told me all—your gifts of”—

“My gifts! No, child—not mine—it is the merest accident that has brought me to this house; where, in truth, it grieves me to find you. Hear me, yet a few words. I would wish to believe you still good—still innocent, Patty”—

“Oh, sir!” exclaimed the girl with sudden passion—“why should you not? What have I done—God help me!—what have I done?”

“Listen, and patiently. I find you in a house, nay in a neighbourhood known and noted as shameful. I came here to fulfil a duty of humanity—prayed and entreated hither to assist a poor helpless creature in her worst agony. It was well I came, Patty, or we might never”—here the apothecary’s voice thickened, and he hesitated—“we might never again have met in this world.”

“I bless the chance,” cried Patty, sobbing.

“I find you, girl”—here Lintley paused, and then sadly continued—“I find you in deepest misery. It seems you are said to be the wife or worse companion of a nightly robber.”

Arrival of Mr. Lintley.

"You do not believe it—you cannot believe it"—exclaimed Patty.

"Stolen property—stolen by him—is found in your bed. Answer me, girl—for others you must answer—how is this?"

"Almost as much as I know, you know. I had fallen asleep; the door was burst in—the window opened—by some strange man, who muttered curses when I called to him. From the window, struggling and striving with terrible strength, he made his way, as I suppose, across the house-tops."

The Story of a Feather.

"A watch was found"—said Lintley.

"It must have fallen from the man, as he escaped," answered Patty.

Lintley approached the girl, and taking her hand in his, looked steadfastly in her face, saying—"And this man you knew not?"

"No," answered Patty, looking back the look.

"And you are as innocent of all this," said Lintley, his eyes moistening—"as I could wish you?"

"I am—I am"—cried the girl. "Oh, sir! You believe me? in this misery you will not forsake me?"

"I do believe you, Patty," answered Lintley, with solemn voice—"and so believing, I will not forsake you."

I am Removed to Cramp's House.

Death of the Old Card-maker.

“NOW, sir,” said Hard-mouth, putting his head into the room. “Now, if you please?”

“You’ll never take her to the round-house?” sobbed Mrs. Crumpet, forcing past him. “You haven’t the heart, I know you haven’t?” and the landlady raised her voice to a scream, and wrung her hands.

“Be patient, good woman,” said Lintley. He then turned to the officer. “This mistake will soon be cleared. Let one of your men call a coach; we will go where you please. Come, Patty,” and the apothecary, with a comforting smile, gave his arm to the girl, and led her, pale and trembling, from the room. In a few minutes a coach drove to the door, and again whirled away. The neighbours departed, and Mrs. Crumpet was left solitary in her silent house. She came into the room; looked wanderingly about her; cried—“If I should hang her! Oh, I shall never know what sleep is again!” And then she went to bed, and lay till late next morning.

In the afternoon, Becky, Mrs. Cramp’s maid, arrived with speed in her looks, and I was taken from the mantel-piece, and placed in a bundle of clothes to be carried from the house. “And the card-maker’s very bad this time?” asked Mrs. Crumpet. “Quite in earnest, now,” said Becky. “Missus says it’s a moral impossible he can live. Well, I say nothing, Mrs. Crumpet; but if she should have a bit of luck, she won’t be long a widder.” Mrs. Crumpet nodded assent to this belief, and Becky, strengthened in her opinion, departed ; the landlady uttering no syllable on the events of the past night.

The Story of a Feather.

I was soon in the house of the old card-maker ; soon heard the chirruping voice of his young wife. "You've got all the things, I hope, Becky?"

"Every thread, mem, and do you know, mem, I think we're in luck to get 'em. That's a wicked old woman, that Mrs. Crumpet, mem," said Becky.

"Perhaps she is, Becky," answered the charitable mistress, "but whilst the world's what it is, wicked people are sometimes useful."

"Pretty goings on in her house, mem," said Becky, with a knowing look ; for it seems she had heard a very imaginative version of the affair of the highwayman and Patty from Mrs. Crumpet's communicative neighbours. "Perhaps, mem, you didn't know that she lodges highwaymen and their wives, or worse than that, for what I know, mem?"

"Highwaymen, Becky," cried Mrs. Cramp, with a shudder, and then she added, with deeper disgust, "and their wives?"

"The man's got off—just like 'em, mem ; and left his wife, or whatever she may be, to be hanged in his place," said Becky. "But that's like the whole sect, mem." The truth is, Becky, in the most unhandsome way, revenged her own inimitable ugliness upon the characters of men generally : they had never said, they never could say, a civil word to her, and it was her especial pleasure to malign them. "Yes, mem, crept out at the chimney, and left the poor girl, mem, with the watch under her bolster. Such a feller as that, mem—why, I'd hang him, mem—by the toes, mem."

Mrs. Cramp, with an exquisite sense of thanksgiving, merely observed, "It's a blessing I've got back my satin and this dear feather."

"Quite right, mem ; and as master can't last much longer, why should you go out to dress when you go to church or to Ranelagh—when you can make yourself comfortable at home?"

"You're quite right, Becky, I won't be the poor trod-on thing I have been—I'll show a woman's spirit."

"To be sure, mem ; and as master has made his will as he ought to do, why, mem, 'twill be your own fault, if you ever let any other nasty lawyer come atween you two again, mem."

It was evident that Mrs. Cramp was suddenly become very independent of the ire of her husband ; for in the course of the day she carried her forbidden finery, of which I was no small part, into the sick man's bed-room. The patient was fast asleep. Mrs. Cramp softly approached the bed-side, peeping between the curtains; and thus, as she still held me in her hand, I had a full view of the old card-maker. His face was sharp and withered; and his nightcap, half removed from his head, showed a few short white hairs, like goose-down. I could see at once that Mrs. Cramp and her mate had been chained by a golden manacle, made at the Mint. The old man's face had in it nothing venerable: it was mere old age—mere decay, without that sweet, serene light, which gives to years a halo of holiness. The young wife looked at her sleeping mate in silence: and then, a deep, deep sigh broke from her almost unconsciously. She retreated from the bed-side as the man awoke.

Death of the Old Card-maker.

"Who's there? devils again!" cried the sick man in a hoarse, trembling voice.

The wife made no answer, but laying me and her other treasures upon the table, she walked on tip-toe out of the room.

"Who's there?" again cried the card-maker; and then he mumbled—"Devils—devils—more devils. And I shall go among 'em—I must go among 'em—no help. Damned—damned—ha! ha!—damned."

For an hour and more the old man raved, groaned, and muttered to himself. He had, as I heard, committed no peculiar wickedness in life; but his imagination had caught a disease from a spiritual counsellor, who, in the anxiety of his soul for the dying man, felt it a duty to convince him that he must be damned. He had dealt in cards; he had made gold by the devil's tools, and there was no help for him; the devil must have him. This comfortable assurance, Mr. Uriah Cloudy conceived it to be his Christian duty to pour once a day at least into the ears of the departing tradesman; who had such confidence in the authority of the Muggletonian—for Cloudy was said to be of that enlightened sect—that he gave himself up to inevitable perdition. Hence, to his crazed perceptions, his chamber was beset by devils, male and female; all of them wearing the faces, forms, and habits of the kings, queens, and knaves of cards; all of them, by such masquerade, torturing the remorseful spirit of the dying dealer.

"Oh! Ugh!" he groaned—"and there, peeping between the curtains—there's that cat, the Queen of Diamonds!" Then he sat bolt upright in his bed; and, throwing his nightcap into the room, he screamed—"Jack of Clubs, my time's not up—I defy you!"

The Story of a Feather.

At this moment Becky entered the room. "Here's Mr. Cloudy come to see you."

The name seemed to awaken new terror in the card-maker, for he fell back in his bed, and howled like a wolf.

In an instant the Muggletonian was at the bed-side.

"Why, man, that's right; howl—howl! It will do you good, poor doomed wretch; if anything will do you good. Ha! that's sweet music—sweet as the sackbut and timbrel," said the self-complacent Mr. Cloudy, as old Cramp yelled in a higher pitch. This spiritual comforter was a fat, squab man, of large breadth of back, huge legs and arms, and a big head, thatched with short black hair, and sunk between his shoulders. He had large, rolling, black eyes, a flattened nose, and wide dropping mouth, with the complexion of antiquarian parchment. "And so you've suffered, poor wretched worm!—eh?" asked Mr. Cloudy, comfortably seating himself in an arm-chair by the bed-side.

Death of the Old Card-maker.

"Ugh! I have suffered," cried the card-maker.

"It's a blessed thing," said the Mugletonian. "But you have suffered? Beware, beware that Beelzebub doesn't deceive you. You're sure you've suffered?—Well, then, thank God!"

"I do, I do—that is, I hope I do," answered the man. "And now, do you really, my kind, good friend—my dear, charitable friend—do you really think I shall be damned?—Are you sure?"

"Cock-sure," cried Cloudy. "Ain't you a wretched sinner? Haven't you lived upon perdition? Haven't you sold traps for sinners' souls? How many lost sheep have you sent before you?"

"But then, my dear friend, I was card-maker to the court; and that may go for something—eh? Mayn't it, mayn't it?" exclaimed Cramp, despairingly.

"Don't hope it; quite lost if you hope," answered Cloudy. "Wretched old man! haven't you put snares into the hands of the wicked? Haven't you sold beggary, and robbery, and self-murder? How many precious souls are now roaring out against you?"

"True, true, true!" screamed the card-maker—"no hope, no hope!"—and then he fell back and groaned. In a moment he jumped up again in bed, and with such new terror in his face, that he made his spiritual comforter leap up also. With an uneasy look, Mr. Cloudy pulled the bell, immediately answered by Becky. She no sooner threw a glance at her master, than she hurried down-stairs, and almost immediately returned with her mistress. "If you please, mem," I heard her say upon the stairs,—“If you please, mem, he's going mad again.”

Mrs. Cramp entered the room, and to my amazement burst into tears. "Dear Mr. Cloudy," she cried, "is it come so near? Is he really going?"

"I have seen many things of the sort," said the tranquil Cloudy, "and I should say really going."

Mrs. Cramp wiped her eyes, and, approaching the bed, asked, "Joseph, don't you know me?"

Old Cramp looked at his pretty young wife, and, with a smile of imbecility, answered, "You're the Queen of Hearts."

The Story of a Feather.

"Poor wretch!" groaned Cloudy "how he's wandering!"

"I'm going—I'm going—see, how they're all about me!—why, the counterpane's all tens of diamonds! And there, there at my bedside—don't you see him?—there's the King of Spades digging my grave—digging my grave! And now, now there's two of 'em on the quilt!" and the card-maker roared, and his face became hideously distorted.

"There's nobody on the bed, Joseph; nobody at all, dear;" said Mrs. Cramp, feeling that she ought to say something.

"There they are," cried Cramp; "two of 'em. Two upon the quilt—here, right upon my knees—playing cribbage for my precious soul! Hush! that's the Jack of Clubs;—the devil—I know him; can't be mistaken in him! And there—that's the King of Hearts: bless his sweet face!—that's my good spirit. Ha, ha! he may win—he may win!"

"A dreadful sight, Mrs. Cramp," said Cloudy; "but now he's going. Comfort yourself—he can't last now."

"Hush, hush! they're at it. The King of Hearts has first crib. Ha, ha! the devil loses—the devil loses."

For more than an hour Cramp, in his madness, watched the progress of a game of cribbage played by his good and bad angel; and, with intense anxiety, looked over the cards, talking loudly of the fortune of the game. Now he advised his good angel in the laying out of his crib, and the playing of his cards: now he rejoiced and chuckled at his successes; and now spat and gnashed his teeth at the prosperity of his devil antagonist. At length the game approached its close; and Cramp sat with his eyes glaring and riveted upon the counterpane, resting his chin upon his hands, and, in the agony of his expectations, scarcely seeming to breathe.

"Hush," he cried; "there is but one hole a-piece to play; only one hole, and, with luck, I may be an angel yet!—Silence, I say; not a word—not a syllable. The devil has to deal—that's bad; never mind—silence. Yes, yes, that will do; never mind the crib now," cried Cramp, still counselling the play of his good angel. "You only want one hole, and you must get it—you must get it. Silence;—it's you to cut, it's you to—What! the Jack of Spades!—One for his nob. The devil pegs!"

And with these words the card-maker sank back upon his bed, and died.

A House of Mourning. I am in Great Peril.

A Message from the Dead.

I WAS in a house of mourning. That is, the shutters were partly closed ; the curtains were drawn : the dressmaker had taken orders for black ; and very dear friends were invited to a funeral. Becky, the maid—I honoured her resolution—struggled hard to look lugubrious, not at all comforted by the prospect of a new gown ; whilst the fortitude of the bereaved Mrs. Cramp was an example to all newly-delivered widows. I protest I loved the woman for her honesty. The breath being fairly out of the body of her husband, that is, her husband by conjugal law, she neither wept, nor whined ; never caught herself in a strangulating sigh ; but wiped all defiling grief from her face as she would have wiped fly-spots from china. She looked more than resigned. Ere Cramp was screwed down, I heard her laugh lustily ; albeit the practised Becky begged her mistress “not to go on so ’stirically ; as ’stiricks wouldn’t bring him back ; and why should they—wasn’t he in heaven ?” Mrs. Cramp declared she couldn’t help it ; and from my heart I believe the woman.

“I was a good wife to him, Becky,” said the widow, smiling in the very sweetness of conscience.

“When he was alive, mem, I always said you was too good for him ; but now he’s jest gone, it isn’t right to say so. Still he was old, mem ; that’s on his coffin, so there’s no harm in saying that. Nothing’s wickeder than to abuse the dear dead, mem. Still he was old."

The Story of a Feather.

"He was," said the widow, with slight emphasis.

"Never could have been good-looking; but, bless him, dear soul! who'd blame him for that? Still he never could have been handsome," sighed Becky.

"I never heard of anybody who said as much. But what's beauty in a man, Becky? Nothing. Nevertheless, he wasn't handsome, God knows," cried the widow.

"And then we all have our tempers, mem, to be sure. For all that, mem, master was a little sour. Sometimes, as one may say, he'd bile over with vinegar."

"He meant nothing, Becky; nothing at all," said Mrs. Cramp. "It was only in our honeymoon, I remember—Ha, Becky!"—here the widow slightly shuddered—"I shall never forget my honeymoon."

"Yes, mem—but you were going to say—what did dear master do then, mem?"

"Swore like any trooper, Becky. But sickness did him a deal of good," said Mrs. Cramp.

"Quite cured him at last, mem. And then—but it's a common fault—he did love money a little, mem?" and Becky paused.

The widow made no answer, but, glancing at her maid-servant, drew a long sigh.

"And what was the use, mem? You know he couldn't take it with him."

Here a burst of light animated the widow's face, and she cried—the monosyllable bubbling from her heart—"No!"

"I wouldn't abuse the dead for the world, mem; but people called him an old Jew," said Becky.

"He wasn't that, Becky," answered the widow, in the mildest, sweetest tone of reproof.

"But he did like to drive a bargain. He did love more than his penn'orth," cried Becky.

"He was a man of the world, Becky," said Mrs. Cramp.

"Ha! mem," said Becky, hardly knowing the truth she uttered; "if so many folks wasn't what they call themselves, men of the world, the world, mem, wouldn't be so bad as it is."

"I don't think the poor man left it worse than he found it," observed the man's widow.

"And then—if he wasn't dead I would say it—he used you like any Turk."

"It was his fondness, Becky; at least, I hope it was his fondness."

I am in Great Peril.

"Ha, mem, I've said it agin and agin, you was too good for him ;" cried Becky.

My belief at the time was, that Mrs. Cramp had long been of her maid's opinion. However, she merely answered, "That's over now, Becky."

"It is over, and a good thing, too ; for although nobody should speak ill of the dead—I must say it—a worser man never lived."

"Becky, don't distress me : come here." With this meek reproof, Mrs. Cramp approached where I was lying, followed by her maid. "'Twill be a thousand pities," said the widow, taking me gently in her hand.

"Quite a sin, mem, to do it," said Becky.

"And yet I must go into weeds," sighed the widow.

"All the better, mem ; you do look so nice in black," cried the maid.

It is clear, I thought, I have been the subject of previous conversation, and mistress and maid are now discussing my fate. What was to become of me ?

"A thousand pities to dye it," said Mrs. Cramp, still gazing at me.

I trembled at the word through every filament. Dye me ! What ! was I to forego, and so soon, the snowy purity of my outside ? In the very beauty of my whiteness—in my excelling candour to be dyed pitch-black—for no fault of mine, but at the whim, the tyrannous caprice of another, to be degraded to the negro ?

"And yet 'twill wear a long time dyed," mused Mrs. Cramp.

"Doesn't show the dirt, to be sure, mem," said Becky.

"Still it's a pity. Yet, I must be in black for a twelvemonth, Becky," observed the widow.

"You must, to be decent, mem," answered the maid. Suddenly, however, she thought of a probable escape, and added, "Unless you marry afore, mem."

"Before a twelvemonth ! What do you think me, Becky ? Well, Becky, we shall see," said Mrs. Cramp, laying me down again, and after a few moments leaving me in solitude.

The last speech of the widow left me in perplexity : for I knew not whether she had deferred the idea of again marrying within the year, or of submitting me to the dyer's mystery : whether she was again to speedily don bridal white, or I was to be immediately doomed to wear enduring darkness. I passed a time of restless misery. I am sure that I felt as a man feels, condemned by inevitable circumstance to be blackened for life, he himself no party to the iniquity. I felt the same anguish at the thought of losing my exterior whiteness; and being after a time used in fifty different offices for the convenient reason, that the dirt I gathered would not show. Can it be thus with men, I pondered? After the first dip and dye in inky guiltiness, do after-spots go with them for nothing? The purity of their white fame once gone, do they show no future dirt? Again I reasoned with myself. What! I asked, if I am no party to the pollution, shall I therefore despair? Say that to outward look I am made black as pitch, shall it be to me no consolation that I feel the same inward purity that I am black only to appearance, not black within? Such were then my musings. I have since learned to look on some men with all their faults, as sometimes little more than feathers in the hands of the dyer.

About ten days had elapsed from the death of the old card-maker, and I had begun to think myself forgotten by his widow, when she took me from a drawer, and carried me down-stairs. I might narrate much gossip of which I was ear-witness, respecting the solemnity of the funeral, with the tea and very hospitable supper given on the lamentable occasion. All this I pass over. Mrs. Cramp—I must own as much—wore her widow's weeds as though she was proud of them. Many of her female friends assured her that she never looked better, whilst to one or two she confessed that, to her surprise, she never felt so.

When Mrs. Cramp had descended to the parlour, I trembled, for there was Becky, plainly prepared for some mission. After all, I thought, are they going to dye me?

“And now, Becky, you will take the feather to”—

A peremptory knock at the street-door mutilated Mrs. Cramp's sentence. Becky immediately answered the summons, and as quickly returned:—“Oh, men! it's that monster of a man, Mr.”—

Becky was a quick speaker, but ere she had uttered the word due, Mr. Uriah Cloudy personally introduced himself. Now women have a peculiar dexterity in hiding things: with almost more than feminine rapidity, Mrs. Cramp threw me at the back of her chair, and prepared herself for her visitor.

“Girl, you're not wanted,” said Mr. Cloudy to Becky. “Go into the kitchen.”

The Muggletonian having been the spiritual adviser of the late-cardmaker, for the nonce installed himself the master of his widow's maid. Becky seemed resolved to question the usurpation, but a look from her mistress sent her grumbling from the room.

"You're quite happy, Mrs. Cramp?" asked Cloudy.

"Happy as can be expected," answered the widow.

"It's a blessed thing I'm left executor," said the Muggletonian. Mrs.

Cramp said nothing. "And now, Mrs. Cramp, I'm come upon a solemn business. I come to bring you the words of the dead."

"Mr. Cloudy!" cried the widow, anxiously; as though half-expecting some unpleasant communication from her buried husband.

"You knew my Rebecca? Well, wasn't she a woman? A wedding-ring wasn't lost upon her, was it? Well, she knew she was dying. Dear creature! She knew everything. It was strange, too—at least, if we didn't know all things are for the best—it was strange that she should go only a month before your poor man: but she knew he'd follow her; she knew it, ma'am; she knew it. And so she called me to her, and said, 'Uriah, will you take my last words to that dear angel of a woman, Mrs. Cramp?' Dear angel were her very words, or I'm the worst of sinners. Rebecca, says I, make your mind easy, I'll tell her every syllable. Then she takes hold of my hand—just as I take hold of yours, Mrs. Cramp—and says, 'Uriah, I'm a-going, and Mr. Cramp is coming after me. You and Mrs. Cramp will be left alone in the world. She's a dear woman, and'"

"I don't know what you mean, Mr. Cloudy," cried the widow, never divining human meaning better in all her life.

"It's only my respect for the dead, Mrs. Cramp, that makes me offend you; but Rebecca promised to haunt me if I didn't do as she begged me. 'She's a dear woman,' she said, 'and, as I think, has always had an honest regard for you. When I'm gone, Uriah, you'll be left a poor unprotected creature in the world. Nobody to look to your wants; to take care of your darning, your linen, and your nice, little hot suppers. Oh, Uriah! I couldn't rest in my grave if I thought it; and so, in decent time, go to that dear Mrs. Cramp when she's a widow, and give her my love and my compliments, and say, if she'd be really happy in this life, she'll much oblige me by marrying you.'"

With these words, Uriah Cloudy dropt upon his knees, and Mrs. Cramp suddenly jumping from her seat, the chair fell back to the floor. Becky, startled by the noise, ran into the room, and picking me up, hid me under her cloak. "What's the matter, mem?" she cried.

Mrs. Cramp could give no answer, but burst into a violent fit of laughter.

"It's nothing, Becky, nothing," said the Muggletonian; "only taking on about your poor master."

XXVI

Mrs. Cramp's New Suitor. The Widow's Cap.

“U needn’t wait for Mr. Cloudy, I’ll show him out,” said Mrs. Cramp. “And Becky, go directly where I told you. You know,” added the widow significantly, and I felt Becky clutch me closer as she answered, “I know, mem;” and she immediately turned from the room. Ere, however, she closed the street-door, I heard Mrs. Cramp again loud in her silver laughter; again evidently taking on for the buried card-maker.

It was nearly dark, and Becky tripped along with the true timidity of a London maid-of-all-work. For myself, I was in despair. I felt it—I knew it—I was carried onward to be stained, lost for ever: widowhood had passed sentence upon me, I was to be dyed. I put it to the reader—proud, it may be, of the clearness of his complexion, what would be his agony if he knew that to-morrow morning he must inevitably rise a black-amoor! I put it to you, madam; you, with your milky cheek, carnation-tinted; would you not break your glass when it showed you a Hottentot?

Still Becky tripped along, inhumanly humming, I think, “Nancy Dawson,” when a man, crossing the way, stood before her. Becky immediately drew herself up; and I could feel that her heart began to flutter and beat, precisely as every woman’s heart has beat since the first rub-a-dub in Paradise. Becky knew not whether the monster was about to compliment or insult her; she was equally prepared for either incident.

The Story of a Feather.

"My pretty maid,"—began the stranger.

"None o' your nonsense," broke in Becky, and I could feel her jerk, and I have no doubt she sneered.

"Don't be cruel, child," said the man, in a soft, gentle voice.

"Never was cruel in my life," said Becky, the man's musical words melting in her bosom.

"Well then, my dear,"—and the stranger laid his hand upon the maid.

"None o' your nonsense," cried Becky, starting back; "you'd better not; I wears pattens."

"You have the advantage of me," replied the man, with a bow; "but I am sure you are too much a lady of honour to use it."

"I've two hands of my own, and they're quite enough upon me at one time, that's all," said Becky; "so what you've got to say, you can say with your hands in your pockets."

Becky's reproof evidently struck upon the fine sense of the stranger, for he immediately pulled out his purse, and offering the maid, as it appeared to me, a piece of gold, asked if she would make him happy by accepting it.

Becky received the coin, merely observing, "There could be no harm in that."

"And now, my dear, one word; is your sweet mistress within?" asked the donor.

"In course; crying her dear eyes out for poor Mr. Cramp."

"That's a pity," said the stranger.

"She's murderin' herself," answered Becky.

"She must be saved," cried the man.

"But it's jest like us," answered the maid; "we are all fools alike. I wonder if he'd ha' gone on so about her? Not he; men are flints—not made as we are."

"And Mrs. Cramp is at home? Alone, too, no doubt?" said the stranger.

"Alone," said Becky, and she said no more. Her manner warranted the solitude of her mistress.

"You must tell her that a gentleman wishes particularly to see her," said the man.

"And her husband not been buried a week?" cried the maid, who, however, suffered the stranger to pass his hand under her elbow, turning her towards the widow's house. "I wouldn't do it for a thousand pounds," said Becky, as she stood at the late Mr. Cramp's door.

"'Twill be worth more than that to your dear mistress," said the stranger. "Come, I've no doubt you've the key."

"Well, what a man you are!" cried Becky, immediately producing that domestic implement. "Shouldn't wonder if I get turned away for it. Who shall I say?"

"Say, Edward—that's enough," said the man.

"Hush! Stop a minute, while I see if missus is alone ; a neighbour may be with her," said Becky, softly turning the key, and entering the house with caution, the stranger following her. Becky immediately entered the parlour. "You are alone, mem?"

"Oh, yes," answered Mrs. Cramp, and again she burst into laughter. "I've made such a fool of the man. He thinks"— "Hush, mem ; there's a gentleman in the passage wants to see you. He seized me in the street, and would make me bring him to you. His name, mem—it's all he'll tell me—his name he says is Ed'ard!"

The Story of a Feather.

"Edward! Oh, heavens! bring the candles," cried Mrs. Cramp, sinking upon a chair. Becky immediately flung me upon a table, and rushed out of the room; at the same instant Edward passed from the passage, and—why was not I already dyed to be spared my blushes—and caught the widow in his arms! The worst remains to be told. Mrs. Cramp neither squealed, nor shrieked; nor conjured the man to depart—conjured him by the memory of her husband yet green in earth—by the gloom and sadness of her desolate weeds; no—astounded by the violence, all the poor woman was able to utter was—"Edward! Is it you?"

"It is," said Edward; and somehow it was impossible for the woman any longer to doubt it.

Can it be? Is it possible? Why does not Becky bring the candles? Edward kisses the widow; kisses her, and calls her his Clarissa! To kiss a woman in a widow's cap! Excuse human infirmity as we may, is there not very great presumption in the act? Is it not greeting the handmaid of death—the—but it is plain, Edward wants imagination. Again we ask it, is there not something awful, freezing, in that white, chilling muslin, that sometimes surrounds the face of Venus with a frame of snow—that ices beauty for a twelvemonth? In the superstition of custom, we are prone to think the dead has yet some lien upon her—a year's hold at least. Is there not?—but there is this excuse for Edward; it is dusk; he cannot see the cap that ought to freeze him.

Thank goodness! Becky has brought the candles.

I was now enabled to have a good stare at Edward. He was a very handsome fellow; that is, ninety women out of a hundred would have called him handsome. His figure was thickset, but far above the middle height, with the chest and back of a gladiator. His face was large and open, with careless good humour upon it—his brow unlined by thought. He had a fine colour, black whiskers, a sufficiently large mouth, and remarkably white teeth. I know that Mrs. Cramp thought his eyes—they were black as coals—very beautiful: for my part, I liked not their expression. They were of those eyes that seem always trying to look gay and sparkle; and then there was an occasional dropping down and pulling of the corners of the mouth, as though twitched by uneasy heartstrings. My gentleman had clothed his fleshly man with a due sense of its excellence. There was lace on his cravat—gold-lace on his coat and waistcoat—gold loop and button in his beaver. He wore a jewel on his finger, and took snuff from what seemed a box of embossed silver. And this was Edward!

No, reader, it was not. It was Clickly Abram, highwayman. And did Mrs. Cramp know this? Not she, poor widowed dove. The truth is, she had met the man at Ranelagh; and as, conscientious soul! she could not boast of her husband, she had never spoken of his existence. Again, knowing that Mr. Cramp could not much longer endure this sinful world, his wife, like a provident woman, looked around her for a more than substitute for the dying card-maker, and looking, beheld—Edward. Hence, she had always spoken of obstacles that time might destroy, and then—and then—Edward and she might wed; but Edward must wait. To Edward, the widow was the ward or niece of some ancient villain—for she now and then spoke of an old tyrant;—whilst to the widow, Edward was the only darling son of a rich lady of the manor somewhere near the Land's End. All this, I afterwards discovered; but as I hate mystery, I lay the case at once before the reader.

"Supper—something nice," said Mrs. Cramp in a whisper to Becky, as the widow crossed the room to lay me upon the mantel-piece; and then as she returned—"Never mind expense."

"Ar'n't you surprised to find me as—as I am?" asked Mrs. Cramp, glancing at her mourning.

"Not in the least, my angel—I knew your husband's doctor all the time," said Abram.

"Is it possible? Well, if I'd have known! I shall never forgive myself," exclaimed the widow, trying to look very like a penitent.

"And now the maid's gone, my sweet one—name the day, when shall it be? I'm tired of this damned London, and I don't know how it is, I get quite foolish—I want to see the old lady—I want to hug my old mother again." Such were the filial yearnings of Edward; but we fear that the stir caused by the highway robbery of Clickly Abram had some influence upon his wish for travel. "When shall it be?" he asked, smiling upwards in the widow's eyes.

"Why do you ask me? You can leave London when you like—can't you?" said Mrs. Cramp, with an innocence that would have adorned girlhood at sixteen.

The Story of a Feather.

"No—no ; I don't budge without my dear Clarissa. Come, we'll say next week."

"Impossible, Edward ! Have you no respect for the world ? And my husband only—no ; you must wait a twelvemonth or two—a twelvemonth at least."

"Why ? A man isn't any more dead after a year than after a day, is he ?" asked the highwayman ; and, to confess, Mrs. Cramp seemed willing to be puzzled by the thief's philosophy. "As for the world, it's a damned world, my dear, and not worth the pleasing ; but, I tell you what—we'll get coupled in the country ; come up to town in three or four years' time, and say we're just married."

"Oh, the art of man !" exclaimed Mrs. Cramp, throwing up her pretty eyes in sweet reproof.

"And I say, Clarissa, are you fond of poultry ?" asked the thief.

"Don't dislike a chicken," answered the widow.

"But I mean poultry in its natural state ? Ha ! you should see my mother's doves ; a million of 'em, my dear. How they will flock about you ! And then our sheep, and our pet lambs ; and the haycocks and the orchard ; and the peaches, like your own velvet face, ripening on the wall ; and the pigs ; and the harvest-home ; and the dairy ; and, eh—eh, Clarissa ?" and the highwayman laughed and rubbed his hands, full of glee at the rural objects that his imagination had placed at "his mother's."

Mrs. Cramp was evidently touched by the promised Paradise ; for she said with a sigh, "Well, I do like the country."

And thus the lovers—for we must call them so—talked, until the supper came. Becky proved herself bountiful as expeditious. She had attacked the larder of a neighbouring tavern, and had carried off a most substantial and most varied banquet. And wine and brandy dignified the feast.

Eating and drinking soften the heart. Edward became more urgent for instant flight, and marriage in the country ; whilst Mrs. Cramp said nothing, but sighed the more heavily.

Bumper after bumper was swallowed by the wooer, and his increased passion did honour to the distiller. "No, my angel, we'll be off—off by to-morrow ; and you shall be like a shepherdess in China—and as for that cap"—

Mrs. Cramp, dreaming doubtless of the card-maker, had sat twiddling her cap-strings, until the tie was loosed ; whereupon the enamoured and excited lover twitched the muslin from her head, swearing "it was wickedness to hide such lovely hair."

"Now, Edward!"

"It looks like a bit of his shroud—shall never wear it again—never—never!" And so saying, the husband elect threw the widow's cap upon the fire, thrusting it among the burning coals with the poker; and thus he stood triumphant over burnt muslin, whilst Mrs. Cramp clasped her hands in what she thought was rage, astonishment, and wounded affection.

I am again taken Abroad.

The Widow Loses her Lover and Myself.

It may be supposed that Mrs. Cramp was justly offended at the ruthless sacrifice of her cap—one of the few tokens by which she remembered her departed husband ; one which, when she passed the looking-glass, convinced her she was a widow. To say the truth, she had a liking for the cap ; there was a significant prettiness about it that pleased her mightily. Hence, she was majestically indignant with Edward. He was a brute—a ruffian ; and then, her passion suffering a sweet diminuendo, he was finally a very foolish fellow. She would not take a glass of wine with him ; she would not even touch the liquid ; well, she would touch it and no more. She was not the foolish, weak woman he thought her ; but, if he was very good, she might go to the play with him on Tuesday. Should she ever see his mother, she would tell her what a scapegrace son she had—that she would.

And thus, with the prettiest affectation of remorse on the part of the highwayman, and with a coy, wayward pettishness on the side of the widow, who, never having been wooed by Mr. Cramp, promised herself an enjoyment of courtship in all its dear distracting variety,—thus, till eleven o'clock they sat, unseen Cupids hovering about them, snuffing the candles.

I will pass the separation of the lovers, which Mr. Abram vowed—and he ratified the oath with a bumper of brandy—tore the very heart out of his bosom. Then he burst into the snatch of an amorous ditty, whilst Mrs. Cramp begged him to remember the neighbours. To this appeal he made answer by singing the louder, and vowing if he were hanged he didn't care, he couldn't die at a happier moment. And then Mrs. Cramp wondered what nonsense was in the man's head about hanging; and, finally, she and Becky coaxed him to the door, and "hush-hushed" him into the street.

"Quite a gentleman, mem," said Becky, left alone with her mistress, who sat silently looking at her fingers. "You didn't see his hands, mem; never saw veal whiter, mem; always tell a true gentleman by his hands, mem. Can't be a London gentleman, mem,—has a country look. Ha! that's the place, mem, for my money. I could live among pigs, mem; and then for poultry—for breeding goslings, mem—I will say it, I was born for it, mem."

Becky's avowal of her love for an Arcadian life convinced me that the parlour-door was not without a key-hole.

"Lawks!" cried Becky, getting no answer from her mistress,—"here's the feather; I couldn't take it for"—

"Never mind," said Mrs. Cramp, and she took me from the mantel-piece; "never mind; we'll talk about dyeing it another time."

"Well, it would have been a pity and a shame, mem; besides, you won't be in nasty black a year—I'm sure you can't, mem."

"I've such a headache, Becky," sighed Mrs. Cramp. "I'll go to bed." And the widow, carrying me with her, and sighing very heavily, crept slowly upstairs to her bedroom, followed by her maid. Laying me carefully aside, she sank into a chair. Taking up her pocket-handkerchief, she sat mutely squeezing it between her palms, and then she slightly brushed the lawn across her eyes, and then her lips moved, as with some dolorous soliloquy. At length the widow cried, "This is lonesome, Becky."

"Might as well be buried alive, mem. I couldn't sleep here alone, mem, for the world, mem. And, then, there's that pictur' of master, mem,"—and Becky glanced at a daub portrait of the late card-maker hanging over the chimney-piece,—"it's shamefully like him, mem, isn't it?"

"Don't talk so, Becky; you don't know how you distress me."

"Shall I turn him to the wall, mem?" and Becky, with the word, had mounted a chair to give a turn to the card-maker.

"By no means," said the widow; "what harm can the poor man's picture do me?"

The Story of a Feather.

"I don't know, mem ; but, if I was you, I should think he was always looking at me, mem ; and, then, there's that big silver watch of his at the head of the bed. Well, how you can sleep with that, mem, I can't tell. I should think it was his sperrit, tick, ticking away all night, and I shouldn't wink for him."

"Silly creature !" said Mrs. Cramp, with a very faint smile.

"Why do you wind it up, mem ?" cried Becky.

"Habit, Becky ; I always did when the poor man was alive. But it is loud to-night, and my head is, I think, going to pieces. Put the watch under the mattress, Becky."

"Yes, mem," and in a trice the card-maker's chronometer was crammed away. "Shall I turn the pictur', too, mem ?" cried Becky.

"I'm afraid you should touch it : 'tis in such a wretched state, so worm-eaten, and I don't know what : remind me that I send it away to-morrow to be revived. And Becky, as I see, foolish girl, you are a little frightened, you shall sleep with me to-night."

And mistress and maid slept. The widow, for she told her vision when she awoke, dreamt that she was carried to the Land's End through the air, drawn by a team of pouter pigeons ; whilst Becky, who was also favoured with a vision, declared that she had hatched a couple of dozen of goose-eggs, with twin goslings in every one of them.

Days passed on, and every day gave new brightness to the widow. She sang louder, laughed louder, trod her chamber with lighter step, and would lie and giggle in bed, Becky giggling in concert with her mistress. One morning, the widow observed to her confidential friend, "This black, Becky, is sad hypocrisy."

"To be sure, mem, it is ; but then, mem, we can't be respectable without it."

"And then people stare so, if they see one in weeds with a gentleman, especially if one smiles, or"— "A wicked world, mem ; think people ought to have their sperrits in mourning as well as their backs. I should like to know what mourning was made for, if it wasn't to carry it all off."

"I'll not go out in black to-morrow," said the widow, after a pause.

"Well, mem, I honours you for the resolution," cried Becky.

"At the same time the neighbours needn't know it," observed Mrs. Cramp.

"Why should they, mem ? Ah, them neighbours ! They're the cuss of one's life, mem. How happy all the world might be, mem, if all the world hadn't neighbours, mem."

The Widow Loses her Lover and Myself.

"I can wrap a cloak about me, and sneak into a coach, Becky," said Mrs. Cramp.

"And not a mouse be the wiser," said her maid.

The morrow came, the widow flung aside her black, and burst into colours. More ; as an excelling bit of beauty, she took me. I was placed in her head ; and I was delighted to find, as she looked and looked in the glass, that she fully appreciated the value of my presence. "A beautiful feather, isn't it, Becky?"

"I'll tell you the world's truth, mem," cried Becky, putting together her extended palms, and flinging them from her as she spoke—I've seen the Queen, mem, and she isn't fit to see you to bed, mem." Thus irreverently did Becky speak of her anointed majesty, Queen Charlotte, of rappee memory.

It was evening ; a coach was called. Mrs. Cramp, as cautiously as a midnight cat would cross a gutter, put her foot into the street, and for an instant looked hurriedly about her : the next moment she was in the coach. The action was rapid, yet I thought I saw two or three figures on the opposite side of the way, watching the progress of innocent Mrs. Cramp.

The coach drove on. At length it stopped at the corner of a street. "All right," said a voice to the coachman, and immediately the door was opened, and "Edward" was seated beside Mrs. Cramp. "My angel!" he cried, "why wouldn't you let me take you up?"

"The neighbours, Edward—the neighbours," said the widow.

"The fellow knows where to drive?" asked the highwayman.

"I've told him—he can't mistake," said Mrs. Cramp. The coach rolled on.

"This surely can't be the way," cried the thief.

"He can't be wrong—I was so particular, Edward," replied the widow. "I hope we shall be in time for the beginning."

"Oh, I see ; all right," said Abram, glancing through the window. At this moment the coach stopt. "This isn't Drury Lane," cried the highwayman.

"No," said a man who presented himself at the coach-door, and whom I instantly recognised as Hardmouth, the police-officer—"No, but it's Bow-street."

The highwayman turned round, and grasping the widow's hand, and looking like a demon in her face, he shouted—"Did you do this?"

"What ? what ?" cried the widow.

"Nothing, nothing, my dear," said Abram, assured by the woman's look of innocence. "Never mind, 'twill all be right. Hardmouth take care of the lady," cried the highwayman, jumping nimbly out of the coach, and immediately disappearing amidst a crowd of constables.

The Story of a Feather.

"Edward, Edward!" exclaimed the widow.

"He's in a bit of trouble, mum," said one of the officers.

"Trouble!" cried the widow, and with the word she stood upon the pavement.

"Highway robbery, mum," said the same functionary.

"A robber!" exclaimed the woman, fainting in the arms of the constable, who carried her into the office.

"It can't be his wife, Tim," said a man, as he brought water to restore the sufferer.

"One on 'em, perhaps," was the answer.

In a few minutes the poor soul became conscious of all about her. She was told that Clickly Abram—her Edward—was a known highwayman—that a poor girl was in Newgate upon his account—a girl, sacrificed to his safety. A watch he had stolen upon the highway from a sailor had been found in her bed; what was that to him? He'd hang twenty women, and laugh at 'em afterwards.

Such were the acts, such the character, in brief, of the prisoner. The widow, of course, would not believe a word of the scandal. She insisted upon seeing her Edward; and, careless of all beside, she begged, entreated, that the officers would conduct her into the office. The officers, subdued by an influence which the widow had in her pocket, granted her request. She rushed forward to seek her Edward. In her agitation, I fell from her head, and for some minutes lay in the passage. And then, a rough, coarse-looking man took me up, and twirling me over and over, and grunting a sort of approbation of my beauty, put me under his waistcoat.

XXVIII

I am Taken to Newgate. The Turnkey and his Wife.

discovered that my new owner was a tenant of Newgate. Official business of some kind had for a time drawn him from his home to the police-office. I cannot clearly tell the purpose of his errand ; but I believe it was to speak to new evidence which had come out against some thief committed for trial ; and that duty fulfilled, my possessor had nought to do but straightway seek his home in the Old Bailey. Nevertheless, he lingered about the office, whiling away the pleasant minutes in sessional discourse, with old acquaintance. "Hanging must be the end of this?" said he to an emissary of justice. "Click can't get off this time?"

"Lord love you, no, Mister Traply," was the answer. "He may get measured for his coffin the first minute he has to spare."

"He's a fine fellow, and won't disgrace Tyburn," said my new master. "Ha ! Tom—it's a pity for the time folks have to live, that they can't 'serminate as to what belongs to 'em, and what don't."

"I don't know ; it's all right and proper to say so ; but if they did, what would become of us?"

"That's true, too. Well, it takes all sorts to make a world ;" and with this worn adage, my new possessor prepared himself to depart, when Clickly Abram was brought into the hall, in the custody of a couple of officers, poor Mrs. Cramp with streaming eyes and ashy face, following him ; and declaring between her sobs, that "they should never tear him from her."

"Tell you what it is, mum," said Traply, gently taking the woman aside. 'I'm turnkey in Newgate; and if you like to come there, you may be as happy as the day is long with him."

"Heaven bless you!" cried the widow. Nor did the excess of her gratitude make her forgetful of the surer means of touching Mr. Traply's sympathy.

"I can have a coach?" said the highwayman, looking about him with dignity.

"To be sure you can, captain," cried Traply; "and more than that, I'll ride with you."

The coach was speedily procured, and Mr. Abram as quickly invited to enter it.

"We shall be happy yet," cried Mrs. Cramp, throwing herself into the highwayman's arms.

"As turtles, my darling," said Abram; and then, in a lower voice, "don't forget the money."

Mrs. Cramp answered hysterically, "She would die first;" and then again and again embracing the thief, she was at length separated from him, fainting in the arms of an officer.

"All right. Newgate!" cried a linkman with a laugh, having just picked up a shilling, thrown to him by the culprit, as the coach was about to drive away.

"It's not so bad, I hope, sir?" said Traply, who had seated himself beside Abram.

"A bagatelle," answered the thief.

"I thought so," cried the turnkey; "and that's not capital."

Rapidly the minutes passed, and we stopt at Newgate. I shall never forget that dead halt. Ere the prison-door was opened, it seemed to me a pause between life and death—and then, what a terrible transition! Now, and the man, albeit a prisoner, had outdoor life about him; saw the worldly working of men; saw free faces; beheld the passers-by carrying on the business of life: some were going to their homes; some, as perhaps the prisoner fashioned to himself, going to merry meetings. And yet he—he—was as unthought of, as unacknowledged, as though he had never been. Still he felt himself a part of the world; he saw its people, and he was of them; another instant—the prison-door had closed upon him, and the outward world was to him a dream! Between this and that side of a prison threshold, may there not be grey hairs?

My possessor, Mr. Traply, was a privileged man in Newgate; and therefore, as others might say, he was permitted to have his greatest comforts about him. And Mrs. Traply was allowed to do her best to turn a gaol to Paradise by her presence. I fear, however, that the opportunity was rarely improved by the good woman, whose first principle was to teach her husband the virtue of humility, by constantly showing to her mate how very much she was above him.

It was late when I arrived in Newgate—very late. Mr. Traply, doubtless to cheat the misanthropy of prison life, had humanised himself with an extra allowance of liquor. That good intention was by no means applauded by the partner of his fate.

"Here you are again, like a beast, Mr. Traply," cried the wife from between the bed-clothes, as the turnkey entered his den of a bed-room. "Well! if my father, the lawyer, had ever thought I should come to this!"

"Where could he think you would come to, when he brought you up, Mrs. Traply,—eh? Where, ma'am, but to Newgate?" asked the bacchanal and brutal husband.

"You're a villain!" cried Mrs. Traply.

"That's my affair, Charlotte," said the turnkey. "Nevertheless, my pet lamb, look here."

"Don't lamb me! Ha! I wish my dear father was only here."

"More shame for you; if he was, he'd be hanged, you know, for coming back afore his time. Now, look here, Charlotte."

"I won't look at nothing," cried Mrs. Traply; who then asked, "What is it?"

Mr. Traply approached the bed-side, and with a candle in one hand, and me in the other, presented himself to the sparkling eyes of his placable wife.

"What a beautiful feather, Mike! Where did you get it?" cried Mrs. Traply.

"Get it? I'm always a buying something for you," said the turnkey.

"It is a dear! But what's feathers in Newgate?" sighed the wife.

"Well, well, we sha'n't always be here, Charlotte. What's the news? Anything happened since I went out?"

Mrs. Traply, taking me in her hand, and carefully examining me by the candle, whilst her husband prepared himself for bed, began, in a changed voice to narrate the events passing in her husband's absence. For once I felt I had been a peacemaker between man and wife; for the late complaining, shrewish Mrs. Traply spoke in accents of connubial sweetness: "That gentleman has been here again."

The Story of a Feather.

"What, Mr. Curlwell?" cried Traply.
'Well?'"

"It seems, as they call it in books, quite a passion with the man. But he says, he'll give anything if we can only tell him how to get the girl off."

"And what says Patty?" asked the turnkey, by this time in bed.

At the word, I trembled; for I knew they spoke of the helpless, innocent creature, then with shame and misery upon her, a captive in Newgate.

"She says, she doesn't want him to meddle or make with the business," answered the turnkey's wife.

"What then, she doesn't buckle to him yet?" asked Traply.

"She quite shivers and turns white

The Turnkey and his Wife.

when you talk of him. And, for all I had her up here to tea to-night, and tried to talk reason to her, she said she'd rather die than she'd have him."

"Well, then, she must die," said Traply.

"Lor, Mike!" cried the woman; "you don't mean it?"

"That is, you see, we must make her believe that Mr. Curlwell can get evidence enough about her—right or wrong, no matter—to hang her, if she won't have him."

"Well, do you know, Mike, I think she would die first," said Mrs. Traply.

"You're a fool, wife," answered the turnkey, "and know nothing of natur. All that we have to do is to keep from her the news that Click Abram's taken."

"And is he taken?" asked Mrs. Traply.

"Is he taken? Whenever I go out of Newgate, I don't go for nothing; I think I always bring my bird home with me. Yes, we have him. It's a comfort to think we have him sleeping as sweet as any babby under the same roof with us." The caption of the highwayman was plainly too high an achievement for Traply not to put in some claim to it. "He's sure to be hanged," said the turnkey, yawning.

"You don't say so?" cried the turnkey's wife, slightly yawning too. "Well, for my part, Mike—after all, you're not so bad; that is a pretty feather you've bought me—for my part, I don't think—no, I wouldn't hang nobody."

"You wouldn't hang nobody!—You're a fool, wife; and don't know what morals is," cried Traply.

"Well, and now you've bought me that feather, what's the use of it?" asked Mrs. Traply, with a quick jump from death to ornament. "Feathers is of no use in Newgate, Mike."

"You don't think I'm always a-going to bury myself as a turnkey, do you?" asked Traply.

"I should think not," said his spouse. "Suppose, now, the governor should die"—

"And what then?" asked Traply.

"Why, you might get his place. I say you might get his place. For you can't think what civil things Alderman Ruby says of you. Then, if you was governor, I suppose I should dress a little different to what I do now?"

"Well?" cried Traply, with a half-snore.

"And then, I suppose, we should see and be seen?"

"Well?" said the turnkey in a fainter voice.

"And then, I suppose, we should go and dine with the Lord Mayor?"

"Humph!" grunted Traply.

The Story of a Feather.

"And I suppose, if we was to ask him, the Lord Mayor would come and dine with us?"

The turnkey was asleep.

"I say, Mike," and Mrs. Traply plied her elbow in her husband's side—"I say, suppose the Lord Mayor—Mike!—you don't hear what I say?—I say, suppose"— Traply snored deeply—most profoundly.

Mrs. Traply having fallen into a waking dream of ambition, would not dismiss it. She, therefore, again moved her connubial elbow:—"I say, Traply—my dear Traply!—I say, suppose"—

The turnkey jumped up in the bed, exclaiming, with most savage emphasis—"Mrs. Traply, I have to go to Tyburn to-morrow morning; and suppose you go to sleep, that you may get up time enough to mend them holes in my stockings?"

I Meet Patty Butler in Newgate. The Turnkey's Wife Pleads for Curlwell.

T the time—the good old time—

I was in Newgate, there was a finer spirit of cordiality between the keepers and the kept than at the present day lessens the gloom of that great, yet necessary evil. The departing spirit of romance still lingered about it. Fine ladies thronged the lobby to roll their liquid eyes upon the gentle highwayman; and house-breakers, though barred from liberty, were still treated as persons of distinction, indulgence being ever vendible for ready money. In those days, Bacchus and Venus were never denied by the grim turnkey; but received with a frank courtesy due to their large influence on the lives of mortals. Hence, Newgate was not the stony terror of our time. Certes, it was not so clean; but then, in all the real enjoyments of life, how much more comfortable! Soap is but a poor commodity, exchanged against that agreeable licence which softens captivity. True, there was then the gaol-fever, that sometimes lessened the fees of the hangman; but then there was permitted ingress to all black-bottles, with no inquisitorial nose of turnkey, snuffing their contents. Even then romance gilded the prison flags, and cast a bloom, a lustre on the footpad and the burglar. Then was there popping of corks and rustling of lutestring. And now is Newgate a hard, dull, dumpish reality; dull as a play-house. As if too in mockery of the glad past, the gyves of Jack Sheppard hang, ignobly idle, in

The Story of a Feather.

Newgate lobby. The imagination may yet play around them ; but, alas ! they are but as a satire and reproach to the poor, weak ankles of the degenerate burglar of our time : to the living felon of present Newgate, as the Elgin Marbles to the dwarfs that gaze on tiptoe about them.

That Mrs. Traply should board and bed with her husband in Newgate was a part of the indulgence vouchsafed in the old, benevolent day : turnkeys are not now so blessed. Hence, I owed my introduction to the gaol, and my early meeting with dear, persecuted Patty. Mr. Traply quitted his conubial bed before daylight, called from his repose by the iron tongue of law. "Ugh !" he grunted, as he put on his clothes, "here's a day, I can tell, to call a man out ! Pretty ride I shall have to Tyburn. It's pleasant enough in summer ; but this weather's enough to kill a man."

"Never mind, Mike," said his wife ; "I've got you what you love for dinner—rabbit and onions ; so let the thoughts of that comfort you as you go and come."

"Ha !" cried Traply, "a man wants something, heaven knows ;" and with this saying he went upon his awful errand, an errand to be lightened by the dream of dinner.

When Mrs. Traply rose, she looked at me again and again, and vowing I should be a perfect beauty when a little put to rights, began to prepare breakfast. Suddenly she stopped ; and then adding a second cup and saucer, said—"Yes, poor dear, she shall breakfast with me ; and, as luck would have it, she's a feather-dresser, she can tidy it up for me." With this thought Mrs. Traply left the room. In a few minutes she returned with Patty Butler, prisoner.

Poor thing ! I thought to see her much changed ; even more pale, more haggard than when carried from Bloomsbury. It was not so. Ill she looked—very ill. But to me she seemed as one who held constant communion with death, and was thereby comforted. There was sadness in her face, yet sadness glorified by sweetest patience. Sorrow seemed to ennoble her. She appeared no more sullied by all the hideous guilt and misery of the gaol than did the light of heaven that shone in upon her. Her eyes were mild and tearless ; and at her mouth there was a smile of resignation ; a smile that showed angelic might of heart ; mighty from its very weakness. Her voice was changed ; deeper, calmer.

"There, my dear child," said Mrs. Traply, whose heart was, after all, unchilled by the flints of Newgate, "there ; make yourself happy with some tea and toast. Come ; you seem a little down this morning. Ha ! I don't wonder at it. I, who have been here these ten years—ha ! my dear, when I danced at the race-ball with Sir Mohawk Brush, I never thought to come to Newgate. A little drop in your tea,”—and Mrs. Traply having qualified her own cup with some brandy, proffered the restorative to Patty.—“You won't ? Well, you know best. I should never get through these days without it. I'm sure it's enough to work poor Traply to death. They hang six more next Monday.”

I meet Patty Butler in Newgate.

Patty spoke not, but shuddered ; then with an effort compressed her lips.

“Jack Ketch drinks George the Third's health every Monday,” said the woman ; “calls him the real father of his people, he does so well know how to correct 'em. Ha !” cried Mrs. Traply, casting a glance at a Dutch clock in the corner, “they haven't got to St. Giles's Pound yet ; and such a day ! Poor dear Traply ! I feel for his rheumatiz. And going, they do go so slow, my dear.”

Patty tried to speak ; she could not.

“You couldn't have lived so long in London without seeing such a sight, my love ?”

“I never did—never will,” said Patty.

“Let us hope not ; for though there's a sort of something that makes one long to see it—I don't know, but it isn't pleasant—no my dear, it isn't,” cried Mrs. Traply, with emphasis. “I was a young, giddy, happy thing, when I saw the first man hanged. Ha ! my dear, little I thought of Newgate then. Well, we won't talk of it. We'll talk of your little trouble, my love. I'm sure I hope it will come to nothing. I'm sure I think you innocent.”

“I am innocent,” said Patty, mildly.

“But my dear,” cried the turnkey's wife, “what's innocence in Newgate ? Bless you, it's better to be a little guilty and safe outside, than be as innocent as snow, and locked up here. Still, you know, my dear, matters do look a little black against you. In case of the worst”—

“I am prepared, even for the worst,” said Patty.

“I don't blame you ; as a Christian, my dear, I don't blame you,” said the woman. “But for all that, you wouldn't throw away your life, my dear ? It would be murder, you know.”

Patty said no word, but sighed heavily.

“And you're so young ; and if you was only once comfortable, I've no doubt would be very good-looking. Bless you! I shall live to see you a happy wife, and the mother of a dear family. Now, there's that gentleman, Mr. Curlwell—the man's a doting upon you. He says he'll lay out his last farthing upon lawyers and witnesses for you: and for money, in a good cause, there's kind-hearted people to be found who'll swear whatever they're told, my dear."

The Story of a Feather.

"I'm sorry to hear it," said Patty.

"What! when they know you to be innocent, and will swear what will prove as much?"

"Never mind; we will not talk of it, Mrs. Traply. I have known but little to tie me to this world; and if it—if I say," here Patty struggled with her heart; then, observing me upon a chair, she said, her lips quivering as she spoke, "What a pretty feather! Is it yours?"

"Yes, my dear; though I don't wear such things now. Ha! the last time I wore that feather I danced with Sir Mohawk Brush—I think I've named him to you before. If he had only kept his word, what a sweet man he would have been. It's been tumbled, my love, lying by in my box; perhaps you can put it to-rights for me?"

"Certainly—I shall, indeed, be glad; for you have been very kind to me."

"And I want to be kind to you, if you'll let me," said the woman. "Now there's Mr. Curlwell"—

"Pray, do not speak of him," said Patty.

"A nice, kind, affable man; older than you, to be sure; but all the better; for die when he will, he'll leave you snug. Suppose now—I merely say suppose—he could get you out of this trouble, if you'd only marry him? Suppose, I say there was nothing between death and the church, what would you do?"

Patty, who had been gazing at me, laid me down upon the table, and, looking full at the woman, answered in a calm, deep voice—"Die."

"You'd never be so wicked?" cried Mrs. Traply.

"I will never be so wicked," said Patty, "so false, so cruelly deceitful towards any man, as to vow a love where my heart sickens."

"Yes, my dear, but to die," said Mrs. Traply.

"But to live," cried Patty, with quick earnestness; "to live and be a daily hypocrite; to feel a daily heart-ache; to shudder at even a word of tenderness: to loathe one's-self for seeming content—happy! Where all this is, what can be life? Oh, no!" said Patty, with a gentle smile, "I have thought of death ; and, indeed, I can die."

"Ha ! my dear, that's often our pride and vanity to think so. But to die any way in our own sheets, with the doctor, and every other comfort about us, and to have all sorts of civil things said in a sermon made on purpose for us, even then, my dear, death is bad enough ; but what, when you go out of the world with a bad name—with the world, my love, always to have something to say against you ?"

"Terrible, very terrible," said Patty, placing her hand to her brow, "but I have thought of this too : and it is little, very little, with the thought of innocence. The world !" cried Patty, in a piteous voice ; "what shall I be to the world ? What to me the blame or praise of the world, when I am in the grave ?"

"Yes, my dear ; but you must own there's a hard trial 'twixt Newgate and that. Ha ! at this moment, poor things,"—and again Mrs. Traply looked at the Dutch clock—"at this very moment, they're taking their last sup at the Pound. Ha ! there's the trial, my love."

Patty trembled from head to foot, and I could see her small hands work convulsively—could see the fighting of her heart to keep the terror down, as Mrs.

Traply, for the kindest purpose, as she thought, painted the horrors of the death-journey from Newgate to Tyburn.

"You don't know what it is, child, or you wouldn't talk in that way. Ha ! my dear, it's very different to going with a party, and sitting at a window to see the poor things in the cart ; that's very different to being one of 'em, you know. Innocence, my dear, is all very well ; but I don't know any innocence that could bear to be stared at by thousands of people, all looking as if they had red-hot eyes upon you. And then to see the whole street swimming about you—and to have the blood like boiling lead in your ears—for a dear soul as was reprieved told me all about it—and how all the men and women looked like stony-faced devils round him—and how as he heard some of 'em laugh, it went like a knife into his heart—and how as the cart rumbled along, he prayed for the stones to open and bury him—and how when he got to Tyburn, ha ! my dear, he was proved as innocent as you are, and yet he felt all this—and how, as I was saying, when he got to Tyburn—but you don't listen to me ?"

The woman spoke the truth ; for Patty had sunk beneath the struggle of her feelings, and lay insensible in the chair.

Offer of Marriage.

“she hasn’t fainted!” cried the turnkey’s wife, jumping from her seat to the side of Patty. “Poor little lamb!” said the woman, as she applied restoratives to the girl, and chatted calmly the while—for her prison-experience had taught her composure at such moments—“Poor little kitten! A stout heart she has for Tyburn! No, no; I shall dance at her wedding yet! Dear me? well, she is gone. Ha! I’m sure when Traply first asked me, I thought I’d be torn to bits first; and now—well, it might be worse.” In this wise, the turnkey’s wife continued to talk to herself, when at length Patty sighed heavily. “Yes, yes,” said the woman, “she’ll cry soon, and then be nice and comfortable.” At this moment there was a knock at the door. “Come in,” cried Mrs. Traply, not stirring from her charge.

The door was opened, and Mrs. Gaptooth with Curlwell, the valet, immediately entered.

“Lor! and is it you?” cried Mrs. Traply. “Here she is, poor thing! but she’ll be better now you’re come, Mr. Curlwell;” and the woman threw what she believed to be a very speaking look at the valet, graced, too, with a pretty bridling of the neck.

“Poor soul! poor heart!—Well, if ever!” cried Curlwell; and he then stared at Patty with knitted eyebrows and open mouth. “Who’d ha’ thought it?” he then cried. “If Newgate hasn’t made her all the beautifuller. Ha! Mrs. Gaptooth, she’s a lily that would grow anywhere ;—a golden flower she is !”

I could perceive that Mrs. Gaptooth had the most contemptuous opinion of Curlwell’s taste ; and this opinion she motioned to the turnkey’s wife, who, by her mute acknowledgment of the intelligence, showed that she, too, considered the valet as a poor, fascinated, lost man. As, however, Curlwell looked for some sort of affirmation from Mrs. Gaptooth, that well-practised woman awarded to him one of her most elaborate smiles.

“She’s coming round—a dove !” said Mrs. Gaptooth. “As time’s getting short, Mr. Curlwell, and as I wouldn’t have you throw your money away upon an ungrateful person”—

“I’ll spend a hundred pound upon her,” cried the valet, with magnanimous energy.

“Not upon another man’s wife, I should think. You’d never be so extravagant as that, Mr. Curlwell ?” cried the full-fed, oily hag.

“What do you mean, ma’am ?” asked Mr. Curlwell. “Another man’s wife, ma’am ?”

“Certainly. If the gal will marry you, why you know best, and may buy your wife out of Newgate ; but if, like a proud saucy jilt as she may be, she won’t have nothing to do with you, why, you’re only saving an ungrateful cretur from Tyburn, to be for what you know, wife to some other man. That’s my meaning, Mr. Curlwell,” said the hideous woman.

“To be sure,” said Mrs. Traply ; “the gentleman oughtn’t to lay his money out in the dark. He ought to know what’s what first. It’s but reasonable.”

“I’ll spend a hundred pound upon the dear creature !” repeated the valet.

“You’ll do as you like, Mr. Curlwell ; but, as your friend,—though, the Lord help me ! real friends are held cheap now-a-days—as your friend, and as the trial’s coming on next week, you ought not to throw away your money, the reward of your honest labour—the very sweat of your brow, as I may say—without knowing what for. So let the gal speak out, once and for all. For my part, I’m upright and downstraight, and can’t abide pigs in pokes. And now,” cried Mrs. Gaptooth, dropping with physical emphasis upon a chair, “now you know my mind.”

“She’s coming to,” said Mrs. Traply.

“Go into the next room—he may, my dear, mayn’t he ?—and, when the gal’s quite recovered, you can get an answer.” Thus counselled Mrs. Gaptooth.

Mr. Curlwell again muttered his determination to lay out a hundred pounds, and passed into the adjoining room. Mrs. Gaptooth slowly turned her head, following him with a most pitying sneer. She then rose, and approached Patty. "A hundred pounds! and for a nose like that! If the blessings of money arn't thrown away upon some people!"

The Story of a Feather.

"She's getting better," said Mrs. Traply; who continued, in a low tone of confidence,— "You're right, Mrs. Gaptooth. Men are fools, ma'am, when they get a fancy in their heads—quite fools. Noses, indeed! The noses, and the eyes, and the complexions too, that I've seen taken out of the dirt, carried to church, and stuck up for life in carriages! People talk of beauty; but I do think there's often great luck in solid ugliness. She's getting better. Men are fools."

"They are, my dear," said Mrs. Gaptooth; "and perhaps after all, it's as well it is so: it makes all the better for the weakness of our sex. She'll do now;" and Mrs. Gaptooth turned aside, as Patty unelosed her eyes, and looked dreamily about her.

"There, you're better—to be sure you are," said Mrs. Traply, "and it was very foolish of you to take on so. Bless your poor heart! you'll never suffer anything of the sort, not you. No, no; you've too many good friends about you, if you'll only let 'em be your friends."

"I am better," said Patty, leaning her brow, as if in pain, upon her hand. "It was weak of me to—but, pray, say no more of it."

"There, your colour's coming like a carnation," said Mrs. Traply; "and, since you've been ill, some friends have come to see you."

"Mr. Lintley?" cried Patty, with sparkling eyes and animated face.

"No, not Mr. Lintley, but"—

Ere the woman could end the sentence, Mrs. Gaptooth showed herself, approaching Patty. I shall never forget the two faces. They seemed the incarnated expressions of confident wickedness and alarmed innocence. When I first saw the old woman at Madame Spanneu's, I confess I was tricked into a respect for her; she seemed so meek, so mild, so matronly. And now—perhaps it was from seeing her in contrast with Patty—I felt for her a loathing, a disgust! This feeling was strengthened by what I witnessed in the turnkey's room.

The old woman, overlaying her broad ripe face with a smile—a laborious look of complacency—made up to Patty. As she approached, the face of the girl changed to marble paleness; her eyes looked darker and darker; and her mouth became rigidly curved, with an expression of mingled fear and scorn. Once, as from some ungovernable impulse, she shivered from head to sole. She grasped the arms of the chair, and still shrank back as the old woman came nearer to her. She seemed possessed by some terrible antipathy—some irrepressible loathing—that, in its intensity, made her powerless. Still Mrs. Gaptooth, with her undaunted smiles, advanced. She was about to lay her hand upon Patty, when, with almost a shriek, the girl leaped from her chair.

“Creature! touch me not!” Patty exclaimed with a vehemence that surprised me. She then passionately seized Mrs. Traply by the hand, begging protection from that “horrid woman.”

As Patty spoke the words, the shadow of a black heart darkened the woman’s face: in one brief moment, I beheld within it the iniquities of a long noisome life. The old crone stood for a moment eyeing the girl like a baulked witch. It was a hideous sight.

“You’re a foolish, fly-away puss,” said Mrs. Gaptooth, rallying herself, and again essaying her customary smile, though I could see the harridan still shaking with passion. “I come to do you good, and you call me wicked names.—Ha! you have much to answer for—you have.”

“I know the good you would offer,” said Patty; “you have offered it before. I was helpless, alone, without a friend; and, therefore, you offered it.—Oh!” and Patty cried as from a crushed heart—“shame upon you!”

“You silly little child,” said Mrs. Gaptooth, still striving to trample upon her passion. “You foolish little pet,” she cried, and laughing, would have playfully pinched Patty’s cheek, but the girl with a look repelled her—“There, you silly creature,” she continued, “all I said about a lord, and a fine gentleman, and a carriage, and gay clothes, and all that, was only a tale—a story to try you. Now, there is no lord in the case; but an honest, worthy gentleman.”

“You lose your pains,” said Patty, again restored to her composure.

“He can and will take you out of this place,” cried the invincible Mrs. Gaptooth, “and make you his lawful wedded wife. Do you hear what I say, child?—his lawful, wedded wife. What say you now, Patty?”

“I say again to you,” answered the girl, with the natural dignity of a pure heart—“I say again, you lose your pains, woman. Go.”

Patty had overcome the patience of

The Story of a Feather.

Mrs. Gaptooth. That ignominious word, woman!—that name so stung its unworthy possessor, that the old crone gave up her tongue to unlimited indulgence. In a deep contemptuous tone, she first begged to ask Patty what she thought of herself that she called her bettors, woman?—"You, indeed!" exclaimed Mrs. Gaptooth. "You!—woman, indeed! and in such a place!—In Newgate, madam—Newgate!—or, perhaps, miss, I say miss, you have forgotten where you are?"

"Indeed, no; nor the cause, the wicked cause, that brought me here," said Patty.

"Clickly Abram, and a gold watch," cried Mrs. Gaptooth, with a loud malicious laugh.

At this moment I observed the door open, and apothecary Lintley, followed by some one whose face I could not see, was about to enter. He, however, shrank back, the door remaining ajar. The noise caused by Mrs. Gaptooth enabled Lintley to make this backward movement without being noticed.

"I was happy, at least I was content, when you, like some bad thing," said Patty, "when you beset my daily walk—when you followed me to my home—when you uttered words to me. You, an old woman that should have advised, have comforted a helpless creature like myself—when you tempted me with—but you know the wickedness, the shame! It was to avoid you, who seemed to taint my life, I left a comfortable home—lost the means of certain bread. I was driven—by want and sickness driven—to the miserable house, where the most cruel accident"—

"Accident! Ha! ha!" chuckled Mrs. Gaptooth. "Accident put a gold watch in a lady's bed! And do you know what comes of such accidents?"

Patty looked pityingly upon the hard-hearted creature, saying—"Yes; I know."

"And now, you would have the impudence to abuse me—who would have been your best friend—you, standing there, so bold and glib, do you know that you mayn't have another month to live?"

"Oh, Mrs. Gaptooth!" cried the turnkey's wife, moved by the fiendish malice of the hag.

"She does not hurt me; let her speak," said Patty, with a patient, yet a worn and wearied look. "It is very true," she then said, turning to the wretched woman, "another month—or less and I may be with the dead. I do not fear to go to them; and that, your own heart will tell you so—nothing better—that is much. Let me then seem to you a dying creature; and with my dying breath, let me—poor, wretched woman!—let me pray you to repent. Consider it; what a weight of broken hearts is upon your soul! What daily misery, what nights of horror, fall to your account. Repent, I say; or what, indeed, will be the last hour to you? What the thoughts of helpless, happy creatures snared and killed by your wickedness? Again, I say, repent!”

There was a moment's pause. The old woman had recoiled, shrunk beneath the quiet energy of soul with which Patty addressed her. There was a pause; and the woman with a tenacity of evil—a daring resolution not to be awed and beaten by a girl—shrieked at her. Many of her words were unintelligible from their shrill volubility: they seemed to me the sounds of some fierce brutish thing. “What you! you! you!” at last I distinguished—“You to preach to me! To me! Now, I tell you what—I tell you what,” screamed the harridan, approaching Patty with clenched, trembling fists—“I'll see you hanged—I'll see you hanged! If I give twenty guineas for a window, I'll see you hanged—I'll see you hanged—Twenty guineas! Twenty guineas!”

The door opened, and Apothecary Lintley, followed by Mr. Inglewood—whom we trust the reader has not wholly forgotten—entered the room.

“What wretched creature is this?” asked Lintley, looking at Mrs. Gaptooth, as she stood writhing and spent with execration.

She, however, made one last raging effort; for, bursting into a loud hysteric laugh, she exclaimed, “Twenty guineas to see her hanged! Twenty guineas!”

And whooping, the demoniacal woman rushed from the room.

Curlwell's Suit Rejected.

Appearance and Grief of the Widow Cramp.

“AVE I not heard of this woman, eh, child?” said Lintley, taking Patty’s hand. “The wretch! must she follow you even here? But now we will not talk of her. This is Mr. Inglewood, a clergyman, my friend. He had heard your story, and wished to see you.”

“You will pardon me, I hope?” said Inglewood. “It was impossible to suppress such a wish, learning such a history. I came—I felt it my Christian duty—to counsel, comfort you. I find you well prepared; so well, many might learn their best lesson of you. Young woman, the sorrow that has fallen upon you becomes, through patience, a sweetness and a beauty. It is a fiery trial, this,” said Inglewood, with a slight tremor of voice, “and proves the purity of your immortal spirit.”

Patty made no answer; but with downcast eyes and flushing face seemed to shrink and tremble at the commendation of the speaker. Her agitation increased: her feelings had been overwrought in the past scene, and now the voice of tenderness and sympathy quite subdued her. Still grasping Lintley’s hand, her big heart relieved itself in tears.

(Let me seize this moment—for I would fain explain matters as I proceed—to account for the appearance of Mr. Inglewood. As I afterwards discovered, he had become known to Mr. Lintley through Dr. Wilson, who, it may be remembered, was physician to the Countess of Blushrose and her child; and whose recommendation had introduced Lintley, albeit too late, to the Earl's house. When Inglewood renounced his chaplain's office, he sought—but vainly sought—for the humblest curacy. Promises, promises were, after a time, almost his daily food. Still, often dinnerless, he put a blithe look upon ill-fortune, descending from his garret to the world, as though he came warm from every household comfort. And then it happened, that as his purse shrank, his health failed. When he appeared in the prison he looked a disappointed, patient, dying man. Had he made his condition known to the Earl of Blushrose—the Earl's nephew was out of England—that kind, good-hearted nobleman had placed him in employment. Often, the poor parson promised himself to make the appeal; and then something put off the hour. That something could not have been pride; for Inglewood himself was the last person to suspect it.)

"Come, Patty, I have some good news for you," said Lintley. "The man Abram is taken—is now a prisoner in the gaol."

"La, sir, and if he is," said Mrs. Traply, vexed that the secret should have escaped, "the judges won't take his word for the young woman's innocence, supposing he can be brought to swear it: and if he's a chance of slipping his own head out of the rope—oh, sir, I know what Newgate is—he won't mind whose head he puts into it. As for Mrs. Gaptooth, why, she's as good a heart, I'll be bound, as ever beat; but temper, sir—temper spoils the best of us. I'm sure I should be sorry, very sorry, if anything was to happen to the girl; and if you'll take my advice,"—here Mrs. Traply beckoned Lintley and Inglewood apart, and lowered her voice to a confidential whisper—"take my advice, and persuade her to marry the gentleman in the next room, he'll lay out any money on witnesses. And he's quite struck with her; quite foolish like; and more than that, really means honour and nothing less."

"Of what gentleman do you speak?" asked Lintley.

"Mr. Curlwell," answered the turnkey's wife.

"Mr. Curlwell, pray walk into this room," said Lintley, opening wide the half-closed door, and discovering the valet, who, stationed close beside it, had overheard all that had passed. Curlwell, somewhat abashed, awkwardly complied with Lintley's request. Patty, who, for the first time, was made conscious of the presence of her old persecutor, instinctively approached Lintley, as for protection.

"Your servant, Mr. Inglewood; hope you are well, sir. Strange place to meet in, Mr. Inglewood," said Curlwell, whose visits to the Earl's housekeeper, Mrs. Pillow, had made the person of the chaplain no stranger to him. Moreover, the valet wanting a subject to relieve his confusion, availed himself of the readiest that offered.

The Story of a Feather.

"I have heard of you, Mr. Curlwell," said Lintley; "and as the friend, the protector, of this young woman, desire a little plain speaking. Why do you follow her?"

"Honour, sir; all honour," answered the valet, throwing back his head, and spreading the fingers of his right hand over his heart. "I hope, Mr. Lintley, sir, I'm a man above prejudice. And I'm not ashamed to own it, I don't think Miss Butler at all guilty; and to prove it, sir, if a jury should think as I do—and as I've had lawyer's opinion, there's little doubt all may be made straight, if we go the right way to work;" and here Curlwell slightly laughed, and slightly winked; "why, sir, then"—

"And then?" asked Lintley, in a tone not to be mistaken.

"And then, as I said before, sir," answered Curlwell, "I offer Miss Butler my hand, my purse, my heart. Can any gentleman do more?" cried the valet with a self-approving smile.

"Well, Patty," said Lintley, "it is now for you to speak. If Mr. Curlwell has followed you"—

"All love, nothing but love and honour," exclaimed the valet. "Nothing but that could have made me follow her as I have done; seeking her out in all corners. Oh, sir! the work I had before I found her in Bloomsbury—that will prove I'm in earnest. I know, I don't deny it, I've been wild, like other young men; but a man may repent, eh, Mr. Inglewood?"

"I hope you feel he may," answered the parson.

"Never was more certain of anything," said Curlwell; "and so, as I said before, if Miss Butler will let me try to clear this matter up, there's my hand, my purse, my heart."

"Patty," said Lintley again, "it is for you to speak."

Patty, in a most calm, collected manner, as though she had gathered her energies for the one effort, quitting the side of Lintley, approached Curlwell. The valet was plainly flattered by the action, and stood smiling, and working his fingers, ready to seize the hand that he was sure was to be resigned to him. "You would have my answer, Mr. Curlwell? I believe, I am sure, you are sorry for the pain you have given me; from my very heart I pardon you. I thank you, too, for the offer of your help; I cannot, on your terms, accept it. Still, sir, indeed, I thank you. Grant me one kindness—but one. Never again, whatever may be my fate—never waste a thought, a word upon me."

Thus Patty, in clear and passionless voice, destroyed the hopes of Curlwell.

"Well, you know best," cried the valet, with a face of scarlet, violently putting on his gloves, and with equal violence trying to smile. "You know best; I meant well; and if things shouldn't turn out as some other people would desire, at the last moment, don't blame me." Saying this, Curlwell stalked towards the door. Pausing a moment, he returned, approaching Patty. "Still," he said, "if you should alter your mind, remember there's my hand, my purse—yes, my purse and my heart." And then Curlwell disappeared, though unable to divest himself of the conviction that his offer must be accepted at the last: how, indeed, could it be otherwise?

"And now, Mrs. Traply," said the apothecary, "let me thank you for your goodness to my young friend here. I hope we shall not much longer trouble you. Dear me! I had almost forgotten. Here are the drops I promised you," and Lintley drew a phial from his pocket. "Take about twelve drops when you feel the fit come on."

"You're very kind, doctor. Nobody knows what I suffer from vapours, sometimes. And it's no wonder; I wasn't brought up to Newgate. When I was a girl at Chester—do you know Chester?" and Mrs. Traply sighed.

"Very well," answered Lintley.

"You don't know the family of the Brushes?" and again Mrs. Traply sighed.

"I can't say I do; but I have no doubt, from what I have heard you say, they are very excellent people:" Mrs. Traply having, in her short acquaintance with the apothecary, again and again talked of Sir Mohawk Brush and his high relations: insinuating, moreover, that she had never been troubled with the vapours at Chester; which desolating complaint, real or imaginary, had enabled Lintley cheaply to show his appreciation of Mrs. Traply's kindness to Patty. Hence the phial.

"Inglewood, I have some business in the prison: I will not be long," said Lintley, hastily quitting the room, as though animated by some sudden thought.

Inglewood for a moment looked confused. His face flushed, and when he appeared about to address Patty, words seemed to be denied him. And then he sighed heavily, and looking at the wretched girl, melancholy, like a deep shadow, fell upon him. For a moment he buried his face in his hand; he then rose, and walked rapidly up and down the narrow room.

"You don't look well, sir," said Mrs. Traply: "it's the weather."

"It is," answered Inglewood, listlessly, casting his heaviness of heart upon the all-suffering atmosphere.

"Will you try the doctor's drops, sir?" and the woman proffered the phial, the harmless fraud—well would it be were all frauds so harmless—of Lintley. "With me the sky sometimes pours vapours; but then my nerves are like any cobwebs. Like me, sir, perhaps you're not used to London. Now, when I was at Chester"—

"I wish somebody would take you there, and never let you come back again," said Mr. Traply, entering the room, and bringing with him, well nigh dissolved in tears, the widow Cramp. "Here, make this lady comfortable, if there's room," cried the turnkey, glancing at Patty and Inglewood.

"Why, there's nobody here but Miss Butler and"—the turnkey's wife was proceeding.

"Butler! that's the young woman I wished to see! Oh, my dear child! How is he? A blessed creature! How is he?" cried Mrs. Cramp. "Doesn't he ask after me? Isn't he dying to see me?" exclaimed the widow, seizing Patty's hand.

"What is it—of whom do you speak?" asked Patty.

"Of whom? Why, of Edward—dear, suffering, innocent Edward," exclaimed the widow.

"She means Mr. Clickly Abram, the gentleman that's stole a watch," cried a voice; and looking, I observed the faithful Becky, Mrs. Cramp's maid.

"He did no such thing," cried Mrs. Cramp. "Dear slandered creature! he's as innocent as the baby at the bosom. And you're innocent, too," said the widow to Patty; "at least, I hope you are; but at all events, you can clear him, my dear girl, can't you?"

"Truly, madam," said Inglewood, "you seem to forget that the man Abram—that the crime committed by him has caused the misery of this innocent young woman: it is he who must clear her."

"There—there—you're all alike—all against him; a dear, noble fellow. But he'll overcome his enemies yet! Yes! if I sell my bed from under me, he shall. I don't want money; no, thank Heaven, I don't want money."

"Don't missus; don't," said Becky, whispering, and edging close to the widow.

"'Twill be all right enough, ma'am," said Traply; "never a doubt of it. Can't it be easily proved Mr. Abram was fifty miles from the place where the man was stopped, and the watch taken?"

"To be sure, no doubt," cried Mrs. Cramp. "He steal a watch! That noble, generous soul—with the sentiments he possesses! He'd have died first. Ha! they little know Edward; and so my good girl,"—and again the widow, in the very childishness of her grief, turned to Patty—"so you can prove that you know nothing of him?"

The Story of a Feather.

That the watch found with you was given to you by somebody else—that however you came by it, dear Edward knew nothing of the matter?”

“I must beg your silence, madam. I have already told you, the young woman is a victim—a helpless, ignorant victim of the atrocity of the man Abram ; and again I beg,” said Inglewood,—

But he was permitted to say no more ; for Mrs. Cramp, again bursting into a passion of tears, loudly exclaimed that everybody was set against the charming creature—that all the world thirsted for the life of her dear Edward.

Mrs. Cramp's Appeal to Patty.
Visit of a Jealous Wife.

HILST the widow recreated herself with her sorrows—for to me it seemed plain that she took a strange pleasure in declaring her wretchedness—I could perceive that Mr. and Mrs. Traply communicated with one another by frowns and pouts, and other expressive means known to the married; which looks and signs I readily interpreted into great discontent on the part of the turnkey at the presence of Patty and Inglewood; whilst poor Mrs. Traply, by the eloquent elevation of her eyebrows, asked as plainly as ever woman spoke, “How she was to help it?” The truth was, Mr. Traply had returned soured and disgusted to Newgate; for, as I afterwards discovered, the cart had been stopped in Oxford-road by a reprieve, and the horse’s head turned towards the Old Bailey. Such an accident, especially in the winter season, was a mishap to ruffle the turnkey, who, as I heard him swear, vowed it “was only playing with people.” Hence he had returned cold and hungry, and no promissory rabbit and onions prepared for the board. This incident was of itself enough to curdle the milky humanity of the officer. When, however, he saw Patty and Inglewood—from whom, with a fine instinct, he knew he could obtain nothing—when he saw them intruding upon Mrs. Cramp, who declared she had plenty of money, and whom, therefore, the man very naturally wished to have all to himself—he lost the patience which, by the very smallness of the stock, was so valuable to him, and relieved his bursting heart in contempt of Patty.

The Story of a Feather.

"All very fine, Mr. Parson—since you are one—all very fine, sir : but the young 'oman can tell what's what. Bless your heart ! she's not such a fool—she can tell Newgate from pie-crust. She knows it wasn't Mr. Abram as give her the watch ; and though she might turn king's evidence"—

"She'd never be such a wretch ! Never swear away the dear man's life ! Could you be such a monster ?" exclaimed Mrs. Cramp, entirely losing herself in her fears for the highwayman. "No, no, you shall not leave me," cried the widow, as Patty moved towards the door ; "you shall not quit this spot until you swear to me—and this kind gentleman will take your oath—until you swear to me that you'll preserve Edward." And with these words Mrs. Cramp seized Patty by the wrists, who meekly begged Traply to take her back into the prison. "Not till I have her oath ! Not till I have her oath !" repeated the woman hysterically. Patty for a moment forgot her own miseries in pity of the forlorn condition of the widow. "Your oath, my dear, sweet girl, your oath, before this pious, reverend gentleman ! Swear it, and I'll go upon my knees"—

cility, was about to prostrate herself, when Patty prevented her. "Be assured I will say nothing—can say nothing—to injure him," said the girl.

"But swear it ! swear it !" cried Mrs. Cramp ; who was for a moment interrupted in her violence by the return of Lintley. The apothecary had heard of the widow's consuming passion for the highwayman, and placing himself between her and Patty, he said—

"I am come from Mr. Abram."

"From dear Edward ?" exclaimed the widow, "ha, the suffering martyr !"

"I have had some talk with him," said Lintley, "about the stolen property. He knows nothing of the watch, of course."

"I'll be sworn for him ! A love !" cried Mrs. Cramp.

"Neither, Patty, does he know anything of you. No : he does you this much justice ; he says, though they hang him for the robbery, as far as lies in him, he'll acquit you."

"Hang him ! He, a robber ! Oh, trouble's turned the dear creature's brain. I see it. They'll drive him mad, and then make him say all sorts of things against his precious self. He steal a watch ! I wouldn't believe it, though I saw him. No : I'd rather doubt my own eyes than him. But he'll be murdered ; and for her sake—to save her. Yes, yes; I know it—I see it,” and the poor widow, flinging herself in a chair, moaned piteously.

Mrs. Cramp's Appeal to Patty.

“Good bye, sir—good bye,” said Patty to Lintley, as she endeavoured to hurry from the room. Then, after a moment, turning to Inglewood, she said, “Sir, I thank you for this kindness; and whatever may befall me, must think of it.”

“Whatever may befall you,” cried Inglewood, sadly, taking Patty’s hand, “I will pray for the best; and whatever may befall you,” he repeated with earnest yet trembling voice, “I will be here to sorrow or rejoice with you.”

The tone in which Inglewood spoke—I could see it—thrilled the heart of Patty. New emotion seemed awakened within her. She was fixed to the spot—her eyes upon the ground—her face now red and pale. And Inglewood, with death in his aspect, gazed upon the hapless, persecuted girl, and for a moment his eye brightened, and he smiled as though he heard the whisperings of long-silent hope. To me, the couple were a touching sight. The girl, with affections deep as the sea, a wronged and blighted thing; doomed, it might be, to death made horrible by every circumstance of shame; the man, in the first strength of life, with the best nobility of heart; a gentle, upright, holy-minded being, surely withering to an early grave. And in these two, there were new-born hopes; affections for the first time known; a dream—a mocking vision that, for the moment, made the prison-place a paradise, and glorified the hideous present by the happy future. “And shall it be”—I communed with myself—“shall it be, indeed, a dream?”

“Come, Patty,” said Lintley, not unobservant of the girl’s emotion, “I will—with Mr. Traply’s good leave—see you through the passage.” And with this intention, Lintley, taking Patty’s hand, was about to leave the room, when the door was flung open, and Mrs. Lintley—for she soon proclaimed herself—bounced before her husband. Poor Lintley! I could see it: he was a man of firm, yet gentle, temper; he was upon the noblest duty that can employ a human creature; that of administering sympathy and strength to the weak and suffering, and yet for an instant he looked confounded: had he been detected in the meanest act that could vulgarise life, he could not have looked more shamefaced. He had swallowed the bitterest drug in his shop, rather than the words—for well he knew their quality—of Mrs. Lintley.

Now, the apothecary’s wife doated

upon her husband ; and such excess of affection was to her a sufficient reason that she should make him, now and then, extremely miserable. She employed her love upon her husband, as cats employ their claws upon a half-dead mouse ; hence, she would make him keenly suffer her affection. In the first place it was with her an enduring principle that every woman who saw Mr. Lintley—who, in truth, was a good-tempered, sweet-natured looking man, and no more—was from the moment incurably in love with him. Maids, wives, or widows, all were alike ready to sacrifice their hearts, their wedding-rings, and mourning-caps to the apothecary. It never for a moment struck Mrs. Lintley that by such belief she committed a grievous scandal upon all her sisterhood ; certainly not ; she never so far analysed her feelings ; but lived on, with suspicion of all for her conubial creed. The ingenuity with which her jealousy would transform straws into poisoned daggers, and cobwebs into whips of steel, though highly creditable to the maker of the implements, was grievously painful to the sufferer. Let a girl, with a tolerably sparkling eye, enter the shop for some anodyne for tooth-ache : “ Oh,” in the words of the apothecary’s wife, “ there must be something in it ! ” Let her opposite neighbour have a pain in the head, and send for Mr. Lintley : why, “ That woman was always having a pain in the head, and there must be something in it ! ” A poor widow could not summon Lintley to the spasms, but—“ there must be something in it ! ” Nay, had the same widow broken a limb, and sent for Lintley, there would have been “ something ” even in a compound fracture. And then, Mr. Lintley had such an inveterate habit of feeling the pulse of a patient. “ Could he not,” asked Mrs. Lintley, at least when the sufferer was feminine, “ could he not tell what was the matter without squeezing the woman’s wrists ? Oh, there must be something in it ! ” Many a time, when, after a hard day’s drudgery—tramping through the mud and mists of London to his far-scattered patients, the worn apothecary had stretched himself in bed, and the sordid, miserable pettinesses of the world were melting in the balm of sleep,—many a time when that demon, lodged in the clapper of his night-bell, has called him from warm sheets into the raw, drizzling, wintry air, the apothecary’s wife, ere the bell had ceased sounding, has declared it very strange “ that all his labours should be at night : very strange, indeed ; but it was plain enough—there must be something in it.”

Visit of a Jealous Wife.

And this was the woman—the affectionate wife, for she was so, in her own persecuting way—who caught Mr. Lintley in the fact ; apprehended him, with his fingers holding the fingers of Patty Butler.

“Now, Mr. Lintley, I’m satisfied, quite satisfied,” and the little woman spoke as though she was chewing ground-glass. “Yes, I knew it—I was sure of it—I always said to myself, there must be something in it.”

“My dear Nancy”—said Lintley, with his customary meekness.

“No, no, Mr. Lintley ; not dear Nancy—but dear Patty,” and then Mrs. Lintley smiled, as none but women can smile under such circumstances.

“I assure you, Mrs. Lintley,”—and Inglewood was about to intercede for his friend ; but vain indeed his intercession.

“Oh ! Mr. Inglewood, it’s not for me to speak ; but I really am ashamed of you. A parson—a minister of the Church—and here abetting a man—a husband and a father of a family—abetting him, I say, in such doings. The whole neighbourhood rings with ’em ! It wasn’t enough that I was to be insulted in my own house, but he must come to Newgate—among felons, and worse than that.”

“Are you not ashamed, Nancy ?” cried Lintley, and his colour rose.

“No, Mr. Lintley, I am not ashamed, nor you either, but you ought to be. I thought you had given this creature up, but ”—

“Woman,” exclaimed the apothecary, in a stern, commanding voice,—“for your foolish sayings, keep them for your own house, and for my ear—since I must hear them—for my ear alone. But I say to you, speak not a syllable, look not one affronting look against this poor wretched girl ; this victim of ill-fortune ; this patient, unrepining piece of goodness. At another time, your words would have been those of a silly woman ; now do they sound as of a wicked one. Here is a poor, innocent, friendless soul, standing for what we know on the very edge of an untimely grave—yet standing with a courage and a meekness enough to put pity in the breast of a wolf—and yet you—you, a woman and the mother of future women, you with a vain and idle tongue must stab a heart the world so wickedly has bruised. Are you not ashamed ? Blush, I say—blush, lest I despair of you.”

The little woman was awed, conscience-stricken by the stern yet wholesome rebuke of her husband. She vowed she meant nothing in the world, only that she was never allowed to speak, and Mr. Lintley was always so violent. Then she dissolved into tears, at the same time declaring that she thought Patty the most innocent creature that ever broke the world's bread.

The Story of a Feather.

A Conspiracy against Patty.
More Visitors to Newgate. The Misses Peachick.

"DON'T you say you wanted to go into the prison?" asked Traply of Patty; for the turnkey became more impatient of the unprofitable delay of herself and friends. Patty instantly grasped the hand of Mrs. Lintley, and looking farewell to the apothecary and Inglewood, with a forced smile upon her face, hurried from the room, followed by Traply. "God help her!" exclaimed Lintley. "Amen—amen!" cried Inglewood, as from a writhing heart. Mrs. Lintley could say nothing; but weeping, placed her arm beneath her husband's, who, pressing it in token of conciliation, led her away. Nobody remained, save the widow, her maid Becky, and Mrs. Traply; the widow exclaiming against the stony-heartedness of all the world, and the turnkey's wife eloquently sympathising with her. The passion of Mrs. Cramp grew and grew with nursing; at length, in a paroxysm of love and grief, she vowed she would give her last shilling to the lawyers, rather than see her Edward murdered. He—the dear man!—had with his own sweet lips vowed to her his innocence; and yet the world was made up of such wretches, they would not believe him! Nevertheless, she would spend her last shilling upon him.

Poor, departed Mr. Cramp! How—thought I—would it irk your ghost, could it know that all the harvest of your daily shuffling—all the bright, bliss-bestowing guineas, for which for a long life you played at bo-peep with the devil,—all were to be emptied into the bags of law, to save a highwayman for your disconsolate mate ! Had Joseph Cramp toiled, and edged, and scraped, and only to buy from Tyburn a husband for his widow ? Surely, I thought, if elderly folk would now and then—whilst chaffering and fibbing in the world's market-place for the over-reaching pennyworth—now and then ponder on the future outlay of their gains when they themselves should be slabbed over with a flattering gravestone, they would let many a bargain slip, and with it many a sin ! But no, with such folks the spirit of hard-dealing is a spirit hostile to death. It is impossible—thinks the hard huckster—that death should be so unmannerly as to surprise me in the middle of a bargain. No : with the miser, every guinea got is a nail out of his coffin. And so, chuckling, he draws nail and nail, and promises himself the days of Methuselah, when abruptly comes Mr. Undertaker with his screw-driver—more certain implement than the sword of Cæsar.

Mrs. Traply was at length left alone, when, with housewife alacrity, putting her room straight, she placed me in a bureau amongst her other treasures. As she did so, she cried, "There's so many people about that Patty, she'll never be able to put it to-rights. If she gets off, I dare say she'll be like the rest, and never think of the kindness she's had in Newgate ; and if she shouldn't, why then the thing's impossible." It was thus the turnkey's wife speculated upon the life and death of Patty Butler—upon the condition of an ostrich feather !

I was shut up in an old wainscot bureau, through which the light glimmered in twenty cracks, though not sufficiently to allow me to discern surrounding objects. I could, however, distinguish nearly every word that was uttered, though the sound came to me somewhat muffled. Hence, there was enough to alarm me for poor Patty. One whole day I was left in continual terror. Poor, dear Patty ! I pictured her to myself in that dreary prison, surrounded by objects of misery and vice in their thousand dreadful apparitions. I trembled for her : and then, remembering her sweet invincible patience, the mighty gentleness of her heart, I knew she would retire within her own nature, enshrined from prison-taint. I had no fear of the crystal purity of her soul, but I trembled for her life, and, indeed, with good cause, from the voices I heard about me. My first London purchaser, Shadrach Jacobs, the old Jew, was a visitor at the hearth of Mr. Traply. He had been shown Patty in the prison, and he could not be mistaken ; no, he never was in all his life. And then, Mrs. Gaptooth would talk in a low voice to Shadrach, and afterwards laugh horribly. I shuddered, as I felt assured that the life of poor Patty was chaffered for by wretches. Then I heard Curlwell, in a voice of remonstrance, declare that he would have fair play ; and then twitted by Mrs. Gaptooth, who would call upon him to be a man, and not be made a fool of by a brazen slut, he would vow "he'd rather see her hanged than see another man have her." Mrs. Gaptooth would then declare "she was too good for him, but he must have his own way. She had no spite against the wench for her impudence ; none—she couldn't feel spite for the poorest thing in the world—it wasn't by no means in her natur ; nevertheless she'd go and see her hanged with the greatest pleasure." The reader may believe that from these broken sentences, I could piece out sufficient to make me tremble for Patty.

A Conspiracy against Patty.

Days passed on, and from what I could hear, the next day was appointed for the trial of Clickly Abram and his confederate, as she was called, Patty Butler. Now it was the custom of Mrs. Traply—I know not whether it be common with the sex—to visit the treasures in her bureau at least once a day. She would take up, and hang over, and smile and nod at various odds and ends of silk, and ribbon, and lace ; and now and then sigh at an old fan, as though it brought back to her the days when she danced at Chester with Sir Mohawk Brush. The remnants of by-gone frippery, among which I was placed, seemed to tie poor Mrs. Traply to the out-door world. There were laces in that bureau, knitted up with the strings of her maiden heart. There were pieces of silk which reminded her of her lustrous youth, when Newgate was to her a fable ; a gloomy dream ; and nothing more. Then would she sigh, and that sigh spoke of sad experience of hard Newgate stones.

It happened then that Mrs. Traply, in a mild melancholy mood, took me, the morning before the trial, from my dark abiding-place. What she purposed with me I know not, but she was about to carry me from the room, when she was arrested in her intent by the sound of her husband. By the softened tones of his voice, I concluded that he was about to introduce Newgate visitors into his domestic retreat. I was right. The turnkey showed into his room three ladies and a gentleman ; and as they entered, Mrs. Traply at the same time curtsied, and flung me on the top of the bureau.

The Story of a Feather.

The male, and one of the female visitors, I immediately recognised as Mr. and Mrs. Flamingo, under whose auspices, it may be remembered, I was dressed for the Prince of Wales's cradle. They were accompanied by two elderly ladies; and I will here set down what I subsequently learned of them. They were maiden sisters, Miss Amelia and Miss Leonora Peachick, of Man-trap Park, in the county of Devonshire. They seemed, at first sight, as indeed they afterwards proved, sweet, good-hearted old women. Age and celibacy had not soured their tempers, but mellowed them. I have, indeed, remarked through life, that, where the female heart withstands the withering, chilling influence of singleness, it becomes rich, ripened with a thousand virtues, that render it one of the noblest hearts of the world. And thus it was with the Misses Peachick. To this excellence, they united a simplicity of mind almost childish. They were both of an age not to be spoken of, and this was their first visit to London. To them life had been a tolerably long walk upon lamb's-wool; and they knew little of misery, save of that misery in novels, which is generally hung with golden fringe at the end. Hence, in London, they were in a perpetual state of agitation, from the objects of crime and wretchedness which beset them. Every day they vowed they would start for Man-trap Park, there to end their days, forgetful, if possible, of the horrors they had seen; and every day Mr. and Mrs. Flamingo prevailed upon them to lengthen their visit; there was something yet so beautiful—so interesting, they must behold. What would their friends in Devonshire say, if they did not?

I know not if destiny had ordered it as a reward or trial of the virtues of the maiden Peachicks, that they should be sent as first-floor lodgers to the house of Flamingo; there, however, they were, and, under the potent persuasion of the feather-merchant, there they promised some time to remain. It was in vain that they protested they had seen enough of London; Mr. Flamingo knew better.

"No, no," cried the elder Miss Peachick, as she came timidly into the room, "I've had quite enough of this dreadful place. Dear me! Well, how anybody can live with bolts drawn upon them! And you mean to say, Mr. Flamingo, that all those men and women—the poor prisoners, Heaven bless 'em!—that they've all really done something wrong? They don't look like it. There must be some mistake."

The Misses Peachick.

"Most of 'em old hands, my lady," said Traply.

"Confirmed thieves and murderers," observed Flamingo, glibly.

"It can't be," cried Miss Leonora; "it's flying in the face of goodness to believe it."

"And is that poor woman a criminal, too?" asked Miss Amelia, pointing at Mrs. Traply.

"My wife, my lady," said the turnkey; and then added, with a grin, "sometimes a criminal for all that."

"Ha! and the good woman helps you to lock the poor things up, I suppose? And you live here, eh? Well, bless me! And you never let the prisoners out for an airing? They never take a ride, poor things?" asked Miss Leonora Peachick, in the innocence of fifty-three and rustic life.

"Never take a ride, my lady," answered Traply, that officer being mightily tickled by the simplicity of his guest; "never ride, 'cept when they go to be hanged."

"Don't talk in that way, my good man; it's impossible," cried Miss Amelia. "Why, you'll never tell me that they'll have the heart to kill any of those dear creatures we've just left. There's that sweet-looking little girl"—

"What, she? Click Abram's wife, as they call her? Ha, my lady!" and Traply tried to look grave. "Law's all luck; but if she hasn't a good share of it, I wouldn't give the valley of a neck of mutton for hers."

"What! kill that innocent mild-looking!—Come away, Leonora; come away, child. Don't let us stop in this wicked place, for fear it should fall upon us."

"My dear madam," said Flamingo, "there's more to see yet."

"We've seen quite enough of London," cried Amelia.

"Quite," said Leonora; "and nothing that's innocent and fit for Christian people to see but the wax-work, Westminster Abbey, and"—

"The Tower and Bedlam is thought something of," said Flamingo, with a critical air.

"Oh! the king's crown and jewels are very well—very respectable, and all that. But, Bedlam!—Well, I do hope," cried Miss Amelia, with the tears nearly in her eyes—"I do hope that the poor people are really mad, for then they can't know how badly they use 'em."

"Come along. I shall die if I stop here," said Miss Leonora. "Pray, come, Mr. Flamingo."

"Certainly—to be sure; and then, on our way back, we can peep at the debtors through the bars of the Fleet.

The Story of a Feather.

Bless you, ladies! you haven't half seen London; there's enough to delight you for a week."

The maiden sisters, without an answer, fluttered from the room, Mr. and Mrs. Flamingo, with suppressed laughter, following them; and Mr. Traply conveying to his wife, by the eloquence of his looks, the most contemptuous opinion of his visitors.

The day passed—the next day came. It was the first day of the sessions. Mrs. Traply had taken me from the top of the bureau, where I had remained from the first appearance of the Miss Peachicks. She stood, pondering, I know not what; holding me between her fingers, when her husband—it was a busy day—hurried in.

"There you are again, thinking o' nothing but that cust feather," he cried, snatching me from her hands, and about to throw me into the fire. He then paused, and thrusting me under his waistcoat, ran from the room, his wife vainly clamouring after him.

In a few minutes—for I could peep very well from the bosom of the turnkey—I was in the court of the Old Bailey.

It was the duty of Traply to stand in the dock near to the prisoners. He took his place close to Click Abram and Patty Butler—there and then arraigned before the Bench.

The Trial of Click Abram and Patty Butler.

§ the highwayman glanced round the court, it was plain he felt the greatness of his reputation. He was to be tried before a most crowded and most fashionable assembly. His courtesies of Finchley and Hounslow had not been lost upon a reflecting world, that thronged to see a thief who robbed a lady of her watch, as though it had been her heart; who would pick a pocket with the like mingled grace and serenity with which a statesman would propose a money-bill. Clickly Abram had elevated his profession; he had made robbery like war,—at the worst, as people say, but a necessary evil. Hence, high and beautiful women had migrated from the west-end to the Old Bailey, and with scrutinising, sympathising eyes, saw the lion in the cage—the hero in the dock. Clickly Abram, with a smile of killing sweetness, laid his hand upon his breast, and bowed. He was dressed in the fulness of the mode. His linen—the gift of the widow—was of the finest web; and a diamond ring flashed upon the little finger of the highwayman's white right hand, which, with graceful negligence, he rested on the bar of the dock. A jeweller had visited Newgate to fit Mr. Abram with that ring; and thirty guineas, the late money of the late Mr. Cramp, had paid for it. If—I thought at the time—the perversity of an English jury should send the highwayman to that far country where the card-maker abided, what misery might the widow's lover wreak upon the husband ghost! But no; it was impossible. Hang such a man, with such a smile upon his face, such ruffles at his wrists, such a coat upon his back! No law could be so arrogant. Clickly

The Story of a Feather.

Abram was not a thief. No ; he stood in the dock a graceful, light-hearted gentleman, summoned for some good he had performed to receive a sentence of thanks from a grateful generation.

Patty stood beside the highwayman.

She was pale, and, after a brief time, tranquil as a statue. When she entered the dock, a momentary blush, deep as blood, covered her face and arms ; and she stood, struggling against the beating of her heart. The highwayman played his gallantry ; for he bowed, and smiled very powerfully upon his fellow prisoner : he could not have been more polite to the widow at Ranelagh. The courtesy was, however, cast away upon Patty. Though she thought not to vindicate her own guiltlessness by scorn of her companion, she stood in soul apart from him. She felt alone in that dock—alone with innocence.

I looked around the court, and to my surprise, saw many of my old acquaintances. Seated close to the bench, with her eyes upon the highwayman, was Lady Dinah Willoughby. She, of course, came to give a day's recreation to her breaking heart: she was there to solace her sorrow with a highwayman in jeopardy of Tyburn, as she would have regaled her poodle, the pupil of Mr. Spannen, on the breast of a chicken. A trial for life or death was a tit-bit for what she thought her constitutional melancholy.

Not far from Lady Dinah sat the owners of Man-trap Park, the Miss Peachicks. They looked about the court; then in each other's face, then at the highwayman and Patty, then threw up their hands and eyes, and shifted in their seats, in a state of wondering agitation. In near neighbourhood to them were the Flamingos. I could see the feather-merchant look very judicial, as he scanned Patty, and then whispered something to his helpmate, who nodded in apparent affirmation. Flamingo was not a juryman; but he had already passed a verdict of guilty against the feather-dresser.

Mrs. Gaptooth, with a gleesome wickedness in her looks, was amongst the crowd, and Mrs. Traply, and honest Luke Knuckle. Poor fellow! he sat staring at Patty and vigorously gnawing his thumb-nail, unconscious of the feast.

There, too, was the widow Cramp, with the faithful Becky at her side. Poor widow! Tears had touched her beauty: her face looked scalded with weeping; and there, seeing nothing before her, but one form, one face, she sat working her pocket handkerchief into a ball, in her burning hand. Abram saw her, and with a blithe look kissed his fingers towards her. The tenderness was too much for the poor creature; she broke into hysterical sobbing, whilst the homely Becky, with one tear trickling down her nose, took her mistress like a child to her bosom, and a man of office, with a fierce eye cast towards the mourner, bellowed out—"Silence in the court."

Lintley, his wife, and Inglewood were together. Once only did Inglewood exchange a glance with Patty. He then seemed to avoid her; seemed as though he had retired into his soul, and was there praying for her deliverance. The apothecary bowed to

The Story of a Feather.

Patty, who meekly smiled ; and little Mrs. Lintley herself allowed the recognition, never even hinting that "there must be something in it."

Mr. Curlwell was among the crowd, anxious and restless. Now he looked at Patty—now he blew his nose—and now he appealed for tranquillity to his snuff-box : that box—crested with a dolphin with tail in its mouth, Latin, and everything proper—which the valet had proclaimed in the round-house, on the night he had assaulted with his attentions the young feather-dresser in the Strand. Sure I am that that box smote Curlwell's conscience at the Old Bailey ; and then he made himself comfortable with the thought, that if the girl would go to Tyburn and not to the church, the evil was all her own wicked wilfulness.

The trial began. The indictment charged Abram with stealing a watch and certain moneys on the highway, and Patty with aiding, abetting, and comforting the evil-doer.

The first witness called was one Andrew Bishop. He was a rough, dull-looking man, and stared doggedly about the court, as though the business therein transacted was wearying and contemptible. His examination, which I reduce to the main points, began. He had been supercargo to the Mermaid ; she had sailed without him, and he had lost his berth, and all along of the damned watch and the trial. (Here the witness was rebuked by the Bench for bad language ; whereupon, the witness scratched his head.) It was a gold watch, with a ship in the plate, pitching in a green sea, with the words Such is life. He had met the prisoner at the bar of a tavern, the Dog and Duck ; thought him a jovial gentleman ; he sang a good song. Witness left the tavern, and the prisoner went with him : went through a many places. At last, up somewhere by the Long Fields, when there was nobody by, the prisoner clapt a pistol to witness's skull, and said he must have all he had. And so the prisoner took it ; and that was all witness knew—but that he'd swear to.

Mr. Clickly himself cross-examined the witness, and with an elegant subtlety of manner that would have honoured even the coif. In vain : the witness was too dull to be puzzled. He would not stir from two facts. The one, that Abram had put a pistol to his head ; the other, that Abram had taken both his purse and his watch. Mr. Abram himself smiled pityingly upon the witness, and then smiled upon the jury : but it aided him not—Andrew Bishop, supercargo, remained fast to the two facts.

The Trial of Click Abram and Patty Butler.

Shadrach Jacobs was the next witness, and proved that he had sold the watch to Bishop (a circumstance substantiated by the subsequent testimony of his daughter Miriam). He proved that he was present at the Dog and Duck with Bishop; that there was a man, drinking and singing with the supercargo, very like the gentleman at the bar; certainly, very like him; but not the gentleman. There was a girl with the man; and that girl—Shadrach Jacobs would swear it—was the girl in the dock.

Here an ejaculation of disgust was heard from one of the audience, and the officer, looking in the direction of Luke Knuckle, exclaimed, "Silence in the court!" Curlwell, looking at Patty, seemed anxious and irresolute; and Mrs. Gaptooth leered and smiled.

And then came the evidence of Hardmouth and two of the watchmen. They had tracked the prisoner to his lodgings in Bloomsbury, whence he had escaped. They, however, found there the pocket-book (the money gone) and the watch of the prosecutor. The watch was found in the bed of the female prisoner, after Abram had escaped from the room.

Mrs. Crumpet, who declared that she believed Mr. Abram to be a perfect gentleman, deposed that he had lodged in her house. Never knew anything irregular in him. Would have trusted him with untold gold. The young woman at the bar had been a long time sick; and, when the robbery was committed, was in bed. Could not, certainly, explain how the watch was found with Patty.

Three others—witnesses for Mr. Abram—courageously swore that, on the night of the robbery, the maligned prisoner was at Gloucester. I could perceive that the widow, albeit she looked wonderingly at these witnesses, looked not with displeasure.

Mr. Lintley bore testimony to the worth, the goodness of Patty; and Mr. Flamingo, who had been hunted out and compelled to attend by the apothecary, deposed that he thought the female prisoner a very honest woman; and then, on cross-examination, allowed, with great alacrity, that she had been once in the round-house; that there had been a charge against her—something about a snuff-box.

"But that man knows it was all a lie," cried Luke Knuckle from the gallery, pointing to Curlwell.

"Remove that man!" said the judge to the officer of the court; but Luke did not wait to trouble that functionary. Mr. Lintley, however, immediately communicated with the counsel; and when

The Story of a Feather.

Flamingo's examination was over, Julius Curlwell was called and sworn. It was very true, he owned, he had made a false charge—he had found his box—in fact, he had himself addressed, not assaulted, as the counsel said, the girl in the street. It was true he had offered to marry her; since—yes, he would not deny it—he loved her very much. Had never said he could save her if he would. Knew Shadrach Jacobs—but knew no harm of him; would swear—that is, he was almost sure he would—that he had never met the Jew about the trial. Knew a woman Gaptooth (here that excellent matron elbowed her way out of court); thought her character tolerably good; she had been two or three times indicted; would not swear that he had not sent messages by her to the prisoner at the bar; they were not dishonourable messages—that is, they were messages that gentlemen sometimes sent to young women.

Here Curlwell's examination terminated; that is, he was taken off the rack. He had a quick-witted counsel and his own conscience against him. Hence the valet turned pale and red, and shuffled and stammered, and grinned vacantly, and whined, and so laid bare before the court the miserable nature of Julius Curlwell. There never was a more pitiable picture of a weak, dissolute creature. When released from the torture of self-delineation, the valet, with the sweat running from his brow, ran from the court. His evidence had done much for the cause of Patty. Lintley—I saw it—thought so; for he smiled and grasped Inglewood's hand, and Mrs. Lintley herself nodded cheerfully to "the female prisoner at the bar."

And now was Abram called upon for his defence. Leaning forward, he made a sort of sweeping bow to the whole court; and then, with a condescending air, began. "My lord and gentlemen of the jury," said the highwayman, "whilst I regret that the inconvenience of being in this place should have fallen to your humble servant, I cannot but feel that there are circumstances which, at the first blush, demanded, for the satisfaction of justice, that I should be so placed. A robbery has been committed, gentlemen, there can be no doubt of that; the prosecutor, a most intelligent, and I am sure, very honourable man, was despoiled of his money and his watch. He has sworn that I am the robber; and I believe, gentlemen, that he believes he has sworn truly. But, is the fact supported by corroborative testimony? Mr. Jacobs, a merchant of high standing, distinctly states that I was not present at the Dog and Duck ; but that a man, unfortunately like me, was : I must say," and the speaker smiled, "unfortunately for me, in this case. Three other respectable men swear, that on that very night I was at Gloucester. Gentlemen of the jury, I was ! It is true the watch was found at my lodgings : but Mrs. Crumpet lets her every room. It has been said, I was lying concealed there. Gentlemen, it is true : and why ? I was a little in debt—I own it with a blush—a little in debt. Gentlemen, I leave my case to your own intelligence. You will not find me guilty of felony, because I happen to resemble some unfortunate man ; you will not hang me for a likeness ;" and Mr. Abram tried to be jocular ; "you will not find me guilty for having the same eyes, and nose, and mouth, as a highwayman, for such indeed is proved my only offence ; no, gentlemen, you value your own peace of mind—you value your own night's rest, the rest of your wives and your families ; and above all, you value truth ; in which case, gentlemen of the jury, without one anxious thought, do I leave my fate in your hands. I know what your verdict must be, and in the tranquillity of innocence await it."

There was a buzz, a murmur of applause, at the eloquence, the self-possession of the speaker, who bowed acknowledgment. The widow Cramp looked smilingly about.

Patty was then called upon. Her defence was, simply—"Not guilty."

The judge briefly summed up ; and, as I thought, bore hard upon Click Abram : that person, however, seemed to think otherwise : for whilst the jury was retired, he lounged against the side of the dock, and employed himself by trimming his filbert nails.

The jury returned into court. The verdict was given. "Clickly Abram, guilty ; Martha Butler, not guilty."

A loud shriek rang from the gallery ; and then poor Mrs. Cramp, screaming "Murder, murder !" fell in the arms of her faithful handmaid. The highwayman paused, as he was about to turn from the dock, and a momentary look of anguish possessed him, as he gazed upward at the suffering widow.

Mr. and Mrs. Lintley, Inglewood, and lastly the two Miss Peachicks, crowded their way to the dock, to grasp the hands of Patty.

I am taken to Drury Lane Theatre, and become Part of its Wardrobe. The Play-house behind the Scenes.

TRAPLY, by duty of his office, retired with Click Abram and Patty from the dock into the prison. The highwayman, rallying his courage and his gallantry, begged to congratulate the girl on her escape. "Gad's me!" he cried, "I'm glad of it, though I lose the honour of your company to Tyburn. Yet, curse the jury-men! To have one's dinner spoilt by such a set of blockheads! Buttermen and shoemakers to hang a gentleman!" And then Abram burst into a wild and hollow laugh to show his fine philosophy.

"Miserable man!" cried Inglewood;

"your grave is dug; your knell about to toll; death is staring in your face. Wretched creature, would you jest with God?"

Abram started at this passionate reproof of Inglewood, whose pale thin cheek was flushed and quivering with emotion; and then the highwayman, summoning his contempt, stared at the intruder, and executed a long, loud whistle. Inglewood, with sorrow in his face and voice, raised his hands and cried, "Heaven be merciful to you!" He then joined Mr. and Mrs. Lintley and the Miss Peachicks, all of whom were congratulating and caressing Patty. The maiden sisters were weeping—joyously weeping; and Mrs. Lintley declared that Patty should go home with her; she was such a good, innocent creature, and would bring a blessing upon any house. Then Lintley smiled, and Miss Amelia Peachick, slipping a guinea into Traply's hand, begged him to send for a coach. As for Miss Leonora, I heard her whisper to her sister, that "she hoped no harm could come to the poor creature who was found guilty; they had, no doubt, only done it to frighten him."

I am taken to Drury Lane Theatre.

Traply departed on his errand: as he hurried away, I caught a glance of Inglewood; he stood somewhat apart from the group, gazing at Patty—his heart in his eyes. And thus I left him.

When the turnkey returned to his wife, he was so mollified by the harvest of the day, that although he had entirely forgotten me, he suffered his spouse to remind him of his brutality with no other reply than a jocose growl; and delivered me—bent and rumped, and, as his spouse said, not fit for any Christian to wear—into the hands of his helpmate. I was curious to learn the condition of Mrs. Cramp, but heard nothing more than, as Traply reported at supper, that she had been "a crying and a melting over Click like butter." The next morning Mrs. Traply left Newgate, carrying me with her.

In a few minutes, I found myself consigned to the hands of a feather-cleaner in Shoe-lane, with an injunction from Mrs. Traply to be put in order without delay. "It's been a handsome thing in its time, but, like most of us, a little tumbled and worse for wear," said an old woman, the shopkeeper, and as I found, an acquaintance of her customer. "Ha! Mrs. Briggs, when I wore that feather at Chester," cried Mrs. Traply. "Well, well, you may say tumbled;" and, with a significant toss of the head, the turnkey's wife departed, I suppose for Newgate. "She's a nice cretur, she is," said Mrs. Briggs to her dirty shop-girl; "she wear a feather! I'll be bound for't got out of some poor thing in trouble—some dear soul in gaol."

About a fortnight passed, in which time I was cleaned and set in order, and, as I thought from a glance of myself in a glass, made to look as beautiful as ever. Alas! was I to carry my whiteness back to Newgate? Fortunately, no. Mrs. Briggs was a shrewd shopwoman. She had mislaid or lost an excellent feather brought, among others, by a large customer, and she resolved that I should take the place of the missing goods. "As for Mrs. Traply," said her acquaintance, Mrs. Briggs, "she might be put off with anything, and never know any better. Now, Mr. Garrick was so partic'lar."

My heart throbbed at the words. Was I to become the property of Mr. Garrick? Was I to go upon the stage? Having played my part above the cradle of a real Prince of Wales, was I to wave amongst kings and princes of sixty shillings per week? These thoughts possessed me, as I lay in a bundle upon a shelf, among other feathers of all kinds and colours; when, after an anxious three days, I felt myself carried out of the shop with my companions. In a short time, I found myself at the stage-door of Drury-lane Theatre. My bosom beat and glowed, for I was among his Majesty's servants!

Assuredly, there is something subtly intoxicating in the air of a theatre. I had no sooner passed the vestibule of the play-house, than I felt myself an exceedingly great creature. My every filament seemed to expand with new dignity; I felt myself swelling like a cat's tail. It is the atmosphere, I thought. It is the air, impregnated with the spirit of poetry—of mighty thoughts, that gives an elevation, a largeness of manner, even to the door-keeper. The place seemed to me a sort of half-way house, between the sordid homeliness of the world and the revealed glories of the land of romance. I felt drunk; but the intoxication was delicious.

I was soon deposited in what I found to be the ladies' wardrobe. Looking about me, I discovered more than one old acquaintance in the gowns I had fallen among at Madame Spanneu's.

There was my old friend, the lutestring, at times devoted to the nightly service of Mrs. Clive; Mrs. Pritchard was wont to wear the pompadour; and the smoke-coloured cloak had graced the fair shoulders of the gentle Mrs. Abington. I nodded to them; and at night began to talk to them as old acquaintances. They, however, treated me contemptuously as a new-comer and a nobody; desiring me to remember that all the town was mad after them; that, indeed, the world itself could not turn round without them. Snubbed, I was compelled to hold my peace, or now and then to have a whispering chat with a shabby old blue bodice, commonly worn, as it informed me, by the meaner people of the playhouse. "I have never yet opened my mouth upon the stage," said the bodice to me in a tone of melancholy: and when I begged to be further informed of its meaning, it assured me that it was only worn by the girls who acted speechless peasants and tongue-tied domestics. "Bless you," it sighed, "I have never yet been into the first green-room; but have merely stared at it with all my eyelet-holes, as I have passed on and off with the mob. Now, you," said the bodice, "you are sure to have better luck. I shouldn't wonder to see you very soon as Mrs. Oakley, or the Queen, in Hamlet.

I," said the bodice, heaving a deep sigh, "I have never known the sweets of a round of applause in all my life ; now, you'll have it—hot as you can sup it." I confess it, I was in a flutter of delight at these words ; though from what I heard from every piece of raiment that opened its lips, I conceived a deep aversion for Mr. Garrick. No one had a civil syllable for him. "Are managers," I asked of the bodice, "always such wicked people ; such tyrants, such knaves, such shufflers, such hypocrites ?" The bodice made answer, with significant emphasis, "My dear, always."

"Kitty, was the house good to-night ?" asked the pompadour of the lutestring, or rather Mrs. Pritchard of Mrs. Clive, for I shall give to the garments the names of the ladies who sometimes wore them.

"Quite good enough," answered Clive. "That Jew, Garrick, acts worse and worse."

"Now, Kitty," cried Mrs. Abington, in the gentlest voice, "why will you abuse David ? I'm sure he loves you like a brother."

"Yes, as brother Cain loved brother Abel," replied Kitty. "Love me ! Didn't the wretch take me out of Miss Prue, and the romps I've played for thirty years ? Had the impudence to talk of my age. He doesn't see the wrinkles in his own face—as deep and as black as a coal-pit. Why didn't the 'sick monkey' stay in Italy ? I could kiss Beard for having driven him out of the country with cat-gut. The brute ! Took me out of Miss Prue ! Why doesn't he take himself out of Ranger ?"

"But then, you know, love," observed Mrs. Yates, represented by a white satin petticoat, "you know he's a manager." At this all the ladies laughed in chorus.

In a short time I learned all the past and present politics of the play-house. Poor Mr. Garrick had been twanged away from tragedy by the fiddles of Mr. Beard, at Covent Garden. Arne and Artaxerxes had been too much for David and Shakspeare ; and so the manager had fallen conveniently sick—"The rosin-sickness, my dear," as I heard Mrs. Clive declare—and sought the restorative air of Italy and France. "I wish, when they had him abroad, they'd have made him a cardinal," cried Mrs. Pritchard. "Yes," chimed in Clive, with a chuckle, "or a rabbi ; I'm sure they'd have found him Jew enough."

I own I felt myself delighted with the sallies of these ladies, and of Clive in particular ; for though she was always the loudest in her abuse of Garrick, it seemed more as an exercise of her vivacity than of spleen. She called him a Jew—a tyrant—a Turk—a devil; but she did so with a laugh that turned her bitterest words into sugar-plums.

“It must be a delicious life, that of an actress,” I whispered, one evening, when all was silent, to my friend, the bodice.

“I dare say it is,” was the answer; “but I know it’s terrible work to be as I am. Nobody ought to be so miserable a nobody as the nobody of a theatre; only,” added the bodice, “in a theatre nobody ever thinks itself nobody. There’s the little girl who wore me last night. Poor soul! she has a few shillings a week; and is, indeed, as good and meek a little creature as ever bore spangles. Yet, when even the king and queen come to the house, does she think herself one of the chief attractions of the show.”

“And, after all,” said the bodice, “is it not well that it is so? Conceit to a player must be as oil to a machine; a thing necessary to keep the engine harmoniously at work, to prevent the grinding, clanging friction that else must follow. The lower the actor, too, the greater the need of such oil. And nature is kind,” added the bodice; “in such cases, it generally happens, the greater the want, the greater the supply.”

“That comes of your ignorance of stage life,” replied the bodice; “nay, I might add of life in almost every variety. Is there so hard a lesson for a man to con as to learn that he is nobody? In a play-house it is especially difficult. Here, strange as it may seem, men are kept in stirring spirits by a lively sense of their wrongs. Like eels, they are made the more vivacious by skinning. The man who plays Catesby to Garrick’s Richard believes, but for the tyranny of fate, he could play Richard every bit as well, if not better, than the manager. He recollects the applauses of his youth from rustic hands; he remembers how he made certain barns echo and vibrate, and he thinks with pity of a London audience and Mr. Garrick. Now, make Catesby know his real worth, and you make him a miserable creature. Let a man unconsciously offer a counterfeit guinea, in his ignorance he will throw it with an air upon the counter; and when accused of the attempt to pass a pocket-piece, fly into a tempestuous passion, making loud assertions of his honour and gentility. Let the same man, if he can persuade himself to the act, knowingly offer the bad coin, and with what a poor, sneaking grace will he acquit himself! Now, the Catesby I speak of, and such actors, never will be persuaded that their Richards are pocket-pieces. No; they are gold—best Mint gold; but it is the perverseness, the injustice of men, that flings them back upon their hands. They are, however, rich that they themselves possess them, although refused by all the world. Prove the pieces brass or copper, make their holders know as much, and they, in that knowledge, would be ‘poor indeed.’”

“I understand,” I replied. “In truth, I have fallen amongst a strange people.”

“Nay, if they have follies, weaknesses—and who has not?—to laugh at, there are virtues, even in a play-house soil, to praise and venerate.”

“Listen,” said the bodice. “I spoke of Fanny Davis, the little girl who last night wore me. I will tell you a short, a very short history, of that gentle, that heroic child.”

Something more of Fanny Davis.

The Poor Actor's Home. Miss Gauntwolt.

ANNY DAVIS," continued the bodice, "is only now in her seventeenth year; and for her salary, she may, perhaps, have as many shillings as years. Yet is she the most discreet, the most gentle of creatures. Her first baby recollections are of the play-house. From the first hour she could balance herself upon her two feet, Fanny was an actress. Ere she had been twenty months in the world's theatre, she was a little toddling fairy at one shilling per night. Being the child of poorest actors—folks just trusted with syllables in London—her baby earnings were precious silver drops in the small household cup of her parents. Hence, too, she had no real childhood. Happily for her, she was not an infant wonder. She was not taught to think herself a little lump of brain in red shoes; a dwarfed woman housed in the image of an infant. Oh, those baby prodigies!" cried the bodice.

"Baby prodigies!" I echoed in my ignorance.

"Comedy and tragedy queens of six years old," said the bodice. "Creatures made to chew Shakspeare with their pap; poor little souls forced out of babyhood to mum maturity. And they catch a trick of it, poor things; and full-grown babies stare, and applaud, and whoop at the miracle, as doubtless Adam wondered when the first parrot cried 'Pretty Poll!' To make a prodigy of this sort, you must first kill the baby. Depend upon it, these doings are child-murders, with only this difference—they escape the coroner. Happily, I say then, Fanny Davis was none of these. She was not fed on the applauses of an audience—she was not brought up by the clapping hands of a wise and discerning public. To this moment she has never heard her voice upon the stage, but is accounted no more of than a part of the human furniture which makes up the train of queens and princesses; is now one of a mob of happy villagers, and now a silent chambermaid. Hence, to Fanny there is no hope—none. She can never be an actress—never anything but a sort of fringe upon an actress's robe. Her seventeen shillings per week may have increase of three—and there, in the play-house at least—must the hopes of Fanny rest. And the best of it is, dear creature, she knows this, and in all her poverty is blithe as a robin in December.”

“Is she pretty?” I asked.

“Very beautiful,” answered the bodice; “and therefore in this place has need of a stout heart and constant spirit. Mr. Garrick is somewhat particular, and doesn't let the wild fellows of the town sharpen their wits upon the actresses—he doesn't suffer his green-room to be a place of ease to other places; nevertheless, he can't stop letters, and presents in them, with promises and kickshaws that catch poor butterfly girls. Generally one a night of these things comes to Fanny, and still it is refused. Only two nights since, a note was offered her. ‘I know nobody to write to me,’ she said. ‘But it is of consequence, Miss Davis,’ said the bearer. ‘Is it so, indeed?’ cried Fanny, ‘then pray take it to my father.’ Bless her!” cried the bodice, “I hugged her for the moment all the closer for it.”

“In good time,” observed the bodice. “But I haven't told you half. Though I loved the dear child from the first time she wore me, I knew not her full worth until about a fortnight ago. 'Tis a touching story, though indeed there's little in it.”

“Tell it me,” I cried, impatiently.

“Last Thursday week,” said the bodice, “I was worn by Fanny, who, I observed, looked ill—very ill. Poor child! She was hoarse—almost inarticulate; and, I could feel, burnt with a fever. Several of the ladies—for Fanny is a general favourite—spoke to her, and begged her to go home. Still she answered with a smile, faint enough, that it was nothing—it would pass off—she should be better. At length,

The Story of a Feather.

dear Mrs. Clive called the under-prompter to Fanny. 'This dear child must go home—she sha'n't stay here.' 'Well,' said the prompter, 'she had better take off her dress, and'—'Dress! Don't talk to me of your rags, man; she sha'n't stop an instant. Here, Nell!' and Clive called to her maid, 'wrap her up warm in my cloak—get her things together, and—you, Bob, go for a coach!' she said to one of the men. 'And mind, Nell, you take her safe home, and say I shall come and see her in the morning.' Now, Mrs. Clive," said the bodice, "is not a woman to be denied anything; even David shakes before her; and so, in a very few minutes, Fanny, well wrapt up, was in a coach on her way home, and Nell with her. I found Fanny's dwelling-place humble enough, but clean and orderly. There were five children, all much younger than herself, at home. Faunty's mother had some time since quitted the stage, as she says, to look after her family. Poor soul! this is a bit of professional pride: the stage quitted her. Her first hold upon it was merely a pretty face and slim figure, and as bloom and slimness departed, why, the stage slipped from her, and she then said it would be cheaper for her to look to her children at home, than to remain in the profession. Mr. Davis, with conjugal pride, is wont to speak of the sacrifice that Mrs. Davis has made for her family; what she might have been, had she continued on the boards, nobody could tell. However, there was no arguing with a mother's heart; the dear soul would have her way, and—it was a sacrifice—but she has it. Mr. Davis had an uncertain nightly salary at Covent Garden, which he always speaks of as our house, though it is now three years since he belonged to it. Poor fellow! He is an honest, worthy creature, devoted to his wife and children, and by such devotion enabled to bear much. He and Mrs. Davis think each other the greatest artists in the world. Hence have they enjoyment—with only a handful of sleepy fire in the winter's grate, and with pale-faced children about them—to talk of the triumphs of one another in the country."

"Is it possible?" I asked.

"True, I assure you; and a great solace it is to them. I remained about a week in their lodgings, and heard them at it every day. 'Well, John,' Mrs. Davis would begin, 'I saw Hamlet last night. People may call it a wife's prejudice, but 'twas nothing like your Hamlet at Cranbrook. I shall never forget that point of yours at the Ghost's speech, "I am thy father's spirit." As for Garrick, he quite missed it.' 'It's very odd, Mary,' said Davis, 'I was just then thinking of the new Juliet, and your Juliet at Gravesend. That line of yours—' 'What line, John?' Mrs. Davis asked with the prettiest innocence. 'Oh, my dear, that line that struck the mayor so much—"As with a club dash out my desperate brains!" There, Mary, though you're my own wife, I will say it, you went quite through the heart. The poor girl of the other night scarcely touched one's waistcoat.' And thus," said the bodice, "the happy pauper couple are wont to flatter one another."

The Poor Actor's Home.

"With an empty cupboard, 'tis as you say, a great solace, and may serve them somewhat instead of beef and ale," said I.

"Yes," answered the bodice, drily; "but they cannot feed the little Davises after that fashion. However, to my story of Fanny. Her poor mother was dreadfully alarmed when the girl was brought home. 'Oh,' she cried, 'those shoes—those dreadful shoes! I knew she'd catch her death!' This made me look at the shoes, which, with Fanny's street attire, Mrs. Clive's maid brought with her. They were worn thin as paper; and though stitched and stitched, there were treacherous holes at the sides to let fever and death in from the cold wet street. Poor thing! in those reeking shoes had she that day stood three hours at rehearsal. 'My dear Fanny!' cried Mrs. Davis, with all the mother in her face. 'Oh, I shall be quite well to-morrow; I shall, indeed. I am not so ill now—'twas only Mrs. Clive would make me come home,' said Fanny. 'And she'll be here, ma'am, she bid me say, in the morning,' cried Nell, who then returned to her mistress. Mrs. Davis assisted Fanny to bed; and then, with heavy heart, rocking her youngest child to sleep, awaited the coming of her husband, who heard the story of Fanny's illness with tearful eyes; and swore that, come how they might, new shoes should come to-morrow. Poor, penniless player! I shall never forget the wretched, bewildered look with which he turned and turned over each shoe. 'I knew 'twould come to this—I was sure of it,' he said, with anxious voice; and then again and again he handled the shoes; again looked at every flaw; and again and again heaving a sigh, dropt them at his feet. He then sat moodily looking at them for two or three minutes, and then leaping up, cried out, 'My God! that I should lose a child—and such a child—for a pair of shoes!' I have seen many a tragedy acted," said the bodice, "have many a time heard Garrick's soliloquy on death—it never touched me half so much as that poor player's grief on two old shoes."

"And Fanny?" said I, impatiently.

"She was better—so much better in the morning," answered the bodice, "that she resolved to go to the theatre. The streets were quite dry, she said, and she could get no hurt. Her father had gone out to borrow money for new shoe-leather, and her mother—as I think—upon the same fruitless errand. Fanny sat by the fire, with one of her little sisters in her lap; and her shoes—the fatal pair—were still upon the hearth. A sharp, short rap struck the door, which, ere one of the children could reach, was opened, and Miss Gauntwolf entered."

"And who is Miss Gauntwolf?" I asked.

"I forgot: you have not yet seen her. She is a girl in the theatre, in the same rank, and receiving about the same salary as Fanny."

"I perceive," said I; "Fanny's friend."

"Certainly not," said the bodice: "save on the business of the house, they never speak. Poor sold thing! but you shall hear all in time. Miss Gauntwolf entered the room in a very cloud of musk. She was—as, indeed, she always is—magnificently dressed, in a sack of rich sky-coloured satin, with cloak and bonnet, and the prettiest shoes to match. 'Miss Gauntwolf,' cried Fanny, colouring, and setting down her sister.

"'My dear creature,' cried the young lady, 'I saw you were very ill last night; and you know, I couldn't rest this morning till I came to see you. My dear soul! you don't take care of yourself. You don't wrap yourself up enough this dreadful weather. Now look at me, I always muffle—always—though I never stir out but in the carriage'"—

"Carriage! Did you not say the young lady had only seventeen shillings a week?" I asked.

"Seventeen shillings," answered the bodice gravely, and then proceeded with the talk of Miss Gauntwolf. "'Now, my dear, I hope you are better—much better,' and the visitor pouted her pretty lips, and threw a look of concern into her mealy doll's face, as she gazed at Fanny.

"'Better, much better,' answered Fanny, rising.

"'Now, don't get up—don't use any ceremony with me. The truth is, I came in the hope of finding you well enough to go to the house. My dear, they do work us to death at that theatre, and so I've told his lordship over and over again; so that if you were recovered, I'd take you in my carriage. There is only my dear father in it,' said Miss Gauntwolf.

"Your father in the carriage?' said Fanny, coldly.

"That's all; and he's nobody you know—so there's a sweet creature—do come,' said Miss Gauntwolf.

"I thank you,' said Fanny, 'I must wait for my mother.'

"Now,' urged the young lady, 'I'm sure that's unnecessary. Do come.'

"Fanny resolutely shook her head.

"But why not? Well, you are such a strange girl! Such a day as this—and you so weak, so ill; and there's a warm seat in the sweetest carriage in the world, and '— “‘You’d rather walk!’ exclaimed Miss Gauntwolf.

“‘Much rather,’ repeated Fanny.

“‘Well, you are the strangest girl,’ again said Miss Gauntwolf, piqued by Fanny’s resolution. And then, at a loss for further arguments, Miss Gauntwolf sat in silence at the fireside, and listlessly, with her pretty blue satin slipper, pushed at Fanny’s leathern shoe.

“Ha, my friend!” I cried to the bodice, “what a picture of ulcerous misery and noble truth is there! Oh that silly satin slipper, that would at all cost ride,—and that heroic, worn-out leathern shoe, that in all weathers, would—rather walk!”

I go upon the Stage.      The Green-room.

The Actors.      Mr. Gauntwolf and a Pinch of Snuff.

In the midst of our conversation, my new acquaintance and myself were separated by one of the wardrobe women, and, for the time, I heard no more of Fanny Davis or Miss Gauntwolf. A few days passed, and, to my exceeding delight, I was selected by Mrs. Clive, and was to appear the next night before the king and queen, in the head of Bizarre in Farquhar's comedy of The Inconstant. Many little incidents, much gossip, which fell to my knowledge in my progress from the wardrobe to the boards,

I pass in silence. My sensations, upon first entering the green-room, were delicious. I was in fairy-land. Even though I had passed through the disenchanting atmosphere of a dressing-room, I looked upon every actress as very near a heathen goddess; and Garrick and Aiken were more than mortal men. Indeed, at first, there seemed to me an air of romance about the meanest person—a something that took them away—set them apart from common life. The very stage carpenters were not, to my intoxicated fancy, the mere mechanics of the outer world. And then the ease, the hilarity of the green-room! The free and mirthful intercourse of men and women! Nothing prim or ceremonious in any of them; but, as I thought, a large, happy family of privileged mortals delighted to delight the world; folks, whose hardest labour was most delicious excitement; whose lives were passed in communicating pleasure, and receiving thereby the sweetest plaudits, and the most approving smiles. I felt this ; I, who had seen palace-life ; I, who had been familiar with the breath and looks of royalty ! Whether it was that I associated the words of Shakspeare with Garrick, I cannot clearly say ; but sure I am, I often thought the actor more of a king than King George the Third. Mrs. Yates, too ! There was such in-born grace in that gentle creature ; and fair Abington, with her sweet, liquid voice, and dove-like looks ; and charming Mrs. Barry ; and kind, womanly Pritchard ; and out-speaking, pure-hearted Kitty Clive, who would beard the terrible manager, and then bestow the kindest words and thoughts upon the poorest underlings—the meek and pauper Fanny Davises : and there were, and are, many, many such, who, looking down temptation with virtuous looks, are made, by their weekly shillings—wages earned in a fiery furnace—meek-hearted ministrants of daily bread to a whole family. I have known many scenes of life, but none in which the filial principle more nobly—nay, in few so nobly—exercised itself as among players, from high to low ; the “vaga-bonds” branded in the statute. Many a time has the house rung with plaudits of Mrs. Cibber, in her sweet devotion, as the self-denying child ! And at that moment, among the few girls, the attendants of the scene—the creatures upon whom undistinguishing profligacy in the boxes would set a price—were those, who practised in the hard prose of life the lovely fable of the poet. Believe it, reader ; I have known Cordealias in cotton gowns, and Grecian Daughters in pattens.

Let me, however, return to the green-room. As I have said, for some time all the actors appeared to me creatures of another world—men and women elevated above common life. At last, I discovered that I had confounded them with their stage-characters. It required, indeed, a strong effort to separate the two. Garrick would be a hero—Mrs. Cibber a heroine. They dwelt in a cloud of rainbow fiction, cast by poetry around them. Or I have sometimes thought the actor—that is, the mere word-speaker, who brings no great original mind to his task—the jackdaw that, innocent of the larcency, is, nevertheless, the jackdaw always dressed in the feathered pens of authors. (Observe, gentle reader, I would not utter this opinion in a green-room. More ; should destiny, in its benevolence, ever again lead me into that elysium, it is an opinion I would there and then most vigorously deny.) It is so difficult for the common mind to disunite the hero and the actor—to wipe off every particle of rouge, and pick off every spangle.

“Mrs. Clive,” cried the call-boy ; and oh ! how my heart beat as Bizarre carried me upon her head to make my first appearance on the stage. Their Majesties were in the royal box ; but in the days I write of, this was a common event. Nevertheless, half St. James’s was in the theatre ; and at different intervals of the night, half the ministry in the green-room. Pelham chatted familiarly with Barry ; and Marquesses and Lords formed about Garrick, as though, indeed, king David held a real levee in the play-house.

“Mrs. Clive,” again cried the call-boy ; for Kitty was talking and laughing to one of his Majesty’s equerries ; “Mrs. Clive, act drop’s up, ma’am,” was the summons ; when Mrs. Clive, Bizarre, and Mrs. Abington, Oriana, hurried from the green-room, and Clive had scarcely time enough to say to her friend, “What an ass that colonel is, my dear !” ere both the ladies were upon the stage. Shall I ever forget the sensation ? I was sick, and dizzy, and blind. As for the folks in front, I could distinguish no one. I saw nothing but a huge, black, moving mass—a vast one thing heaving about, and making a noise ; for the applause, which in my folly I took at first wholly to myself, when Clive entered, was excessive. When it had ceased, and I had a little recovered myself, I heard the king (and so must all the audience) say to the queen, “That’s Clive—Clive—clever woman Clive ; good character—good character—good woman, good woman.” For a moment, I felt confused that their Majesties, who must so often have seen me when I adorned the Prince of Wales, should behold me on the stage. Poor vanity ! how, indeed, should they know me ?

When Clive made her exit, she was stopped at the wing by Miss Gauntwolf, who was to play one of the two ladies who assist Bizarre in her little plot against Duretête. It was a great night for Miss Gauntwolf, for she was for the first time entrusted with two lines : yes, she had on that night to make what we must call her virgin speech, as the first Lady. The second (dumb) Lady was given to Fanny Davis. “Do you like my dress, Mrs. Clive ?” asked Miss Gauntwolf, with a fainting air ; the two lines she had to deliver making her an object of exceeding interest to herself. “Humph !” said Kitty, looking the lady up and down, and then looking her through, “Why, child,” and Clive seized her by the ear, whereat sparkled a very handsome diamond, "whose is this?" "Mine, ma'am," answered Miss Gauntwolf, softly. "Indeed," and Clive took a long breath. "And this ring?" "Mine, ma'am." "And this necklace?" "Mine, ma'am." "All this finery yours, child?" cried Kitty; and then she asked in a voice cold enough to freeze quicksilver, "and pray, what—what may you have given for them?" "Nothing—nothing at all," said Miss Gauntwolf, with forced vivacity. "Yes, you did," said Clive; "yes, you did, poor thing! and bought 'em in the dearest market."

Clive was then making her way to the green-room, as Mr. Gauntwolf, dressed for the Fourth Bravo in the comedy, came up. He was a tall, big-boned man, with a coarse, thin, rugged face, high cheek-bones, and a voice like the edge of a saw. With this, he assumed a sort of pompous gentility, as gilding to the base material. Seeing Mrs. Clive talking to his daughter, he was approaching Kitty, with a mouth set for a compliment, and had uttered a word or two, though I knew not what, when Clive started back, as though from a pit-fall, and with a most tragic intensity of expression, cried, "beast!" She then passed a few steps on, and was met by her friend, the equerry, who again opened small talk, which I did not attend to. The truth is, my curiosity was quickened towards Gauntwolf, who was still near me. I saw him apply himself to his snuff-box—a very handsome gold article, with a picture of Venus painted in enamel on the top. He was snuffing away the indignity put upon him by Clive, as Moody, also with open snuff-box, stood talking to another actor, near him.

Gauntwolf, unasked, put his fingers into Moody's box, at the same time advancing his own. Moody, looking the intruder full in the face, instantly emptied the box visited by Gauntwolf's fingers on the floor. "What may that be on the lid?" asked another actor, standing by Gauntwolf. "Venus—Venus," was the answer. "'Twas given to me, I think I've said so, by his lordship." "Humph!" said the actor, glancing at Gauntwolf, and then at his daughter, "I thought it was Virginia, or the Roman father."

For a long time, I could not understand why it was that everybodysunned Gauntwolf, as though his breath carried a pestilence. At last, I learned the horrid story. That such a man could look in the face of heaven—in the face of man! That he should walk upright! That a reptile in soul, he did not crawl like a snake to his grave upon the dust! That he should live, and bear the loathing of the world upon his shoulders, and yet try to smile, and make grim faces of content beneath it! The unutterable wretch had sold his daughter! He ate, drank, and clothed himself from the spotted fame of his trafficked child. Yes, Mr. Gauntwolf had shown himself equal to the devil in wickedness, and really carried with him the diploma of his iniquity in that gold box—given to him by his lordship!

There! Pah! Let us put some camphor in the ink, and go on.

Mrs. Clive remained talking to her friend as Garrick came from the stage. He was about to enter the green-room, when he met the young gentleman who played Dugard. "My good lad," said Garrick, "you are dull, plaguy dull in this; flat, very flat." "What would you have me do, sir? Indeed, I should be happy to be instructed," said the meek Dugard. "Do!" cried Garrick; "why you must feel more spirit—you must work yourself into the passion that—zounds, my lad! this is what you must do—you must put more Champagne—yes, that's it—you must put more Champagne into it." "Sir," replied the actor, with a literalness of apprehension sometimes found behind the scenes—"sir, I should be very happy, but it's impossible." "Impossible!" cried David, looking with his wonderful eye, "impossible to put more Champagne into it?" "Yes, sir," said the stolid Dugard, "with my salary, how can I afford it?" "Foregad!" cried David, smothering a laugh, "I had forgotten that. No: I see; small beer is the best we can hope from you."

At this moment Fanny Davis, dressed for the Second Lady, was laid hands upon by Mrs. Clive: "Come to my room, child," said Kitty, and—the dressing-room is a sanctuary, of which I speak no further; nevertheless, I may say this much, Fanny wore, for that night, Mrs. Clive's stage-jewels, and what passed between the two convinced me that Kitty had been as good as her word, and had called upon poor Davis and his all but shoeless child, as, from the bodice, I learned she had promised.

The play went on, and I was in the highest spirits. "Kitty," said Mrs. Abington, coming off the stage into the green-room, "there's that viper, Kelly, in the pit."

"Poor wretch! come for the benefit of his venom, I suppose;" whereupon further conversation ensued; from which I gathered that the said Hugh Kelly was one of those insects of the ink-horn that make their dirty meals of public and private slander. Of him, however, I have more to say in another chapter.

"Confound it, Kitty," cried Garriek, in the course of the night, "why didn't you catch my eye in the last scene?"

"I couldn't," said Clive, with a face of delicious impudence, "it so burnt me up I couldn't look at it."

"Burnt you up!" exclaimed Garriek, half laughing, half vexed.

"Quite true," cried the indomitable Kitty; "how poor Mrs. Garriek has endured it, I can't tell: by this time I wonder the poor soul isn't cinders."

Still the play went on. An actor—I forget his name—who played Gibbet, again and again lamented to Mrs. Clive his hard destiny. He was the only man who could play Mirabel; but in that theatre, he was crushed, ruined, annihilated!

The green-room was empty. Mrs. Clive sat alone, unseen, behind the door. Gibbet, the ill-used actor, entered. He thought himself solitary with his wrongs. He stalked up and down the room, swelling and swelling—and then muttering and muttering his injuries. At length, he paused before the pier-glass; and, gazing intently at himself, he clenched his fist, and shaking it vehemently at the reflection of his face, growled with bursting heart, “You—you—you are a—a—fettered—lion!”

“Ha! ha! ha!” screamed Kitty Clive; and the fettered lion, more than amazed, rushed from the green-room.

XXXVIII

I am left in Clive's Dressing-room.

A Colloquy with a Hare's Foot.

AIN would I linger on the glories of the green-room ; fain dwell upon the deliciousness of that fairy scene, in which men and women seemed exempt from all the cares, yea, from the bleak coldness of mere human life, making to themselves an existence of sweetest ease and happiest excitement. Malice, envy, and slander might be there ; but, reader, say where they are not, and what an amaranthine bank that will be—what a half-way resting-place to heaven for human weariness ! For my part, I was so happy smelling and plucking the roses about me that I never thought of the slugs and creeping things that might be at their roots. And then I had seen so much of high life—which I suppose means life nearest heaven—that I had become tolerant of the failings of those living in the lower stories and cellars of the world's Babel ; poor things, in dimness dwelling ! denied the elevating influence of the starry host, which rains down wise humility on the topmost tenants.

An actor is a creature of conceit. Such is the reproof flung upon poor buskin. How, indeed, is it possible that he should escape the sweet malady ? You take a man of average clay ; you breathe in him a divine afflatus ; you fill him with the words of a poet, a wit, a humourist ; he is, even when he knows it not, raised, sublimated by the foreign nature within him. Garrick enters as Macbeth. What a storm of shouts—what odoriferous breath in “bravos” seething and melting the actor's heart ! Is it possible that this man, so fondled, so shouted to, so dandled by the world, can at bed-time take off the whole of Macbeth with his stockings ? He is always something more than David Garrick, householder in the Adelphi. He continually carries about him pieces of greatness not his own ; his moral self is encased in a harlequin's jacket—the patches from Parnassus. The being of the actor is multiplied ; it is cast, for a time, in a hundred different moulds ; hence, what a puzzle and a difficulty for David to pick David, and nothing more than David, from the many runnings ! And, then, an actor by his position takes his draughts of glory so hot and so spiced—(see, there are hundreds of hands holding to him smoking goblets !)—that he must, much of his time, live in a sweet intoxication which, forsooth, hard-thinking people call conceit. To other folks, reputation comes with a more gentle, more divine approach. You, sir, have carved a Venus, whose marble mouth would smile paralysis from Nestor ; you have painted a picture, and, with Promethean trick, have fixed a fire from heaven on the canvas ; you have penned a book, and made tens of thousands of brains musical with divinest humanity—kings have no such music from cymbals, sackbut, and psaltery,—and to each of you reputation comes silently, like a fairy, through your study key-hole ; you quaff renown refined, cold-drawn ; cold as castor-oil ; and, sir, if you be a true philosopher, you will swallow it as a thing no less medicinal. Let me, however, get back to my story.

The play was over, and for the night I was left in Mrs. Clive's dressing-room. I had, I felt it, achieved the most complete stage triumph ; and from the fulness of a contented soul, sighed gently, happily. My future path seemed to me a path of satin and spangles ; and in the completeness of my success, all the sordidness and squalor of my past life faded into a dream ; nothing to me seemed real but the glory of the present. Again I fetched a deeper and a deeper sigh.

"What's all these airs about ?" cried a coarse voice, with something of a rustic twang. I started, but in a moment discovered that the speaker was a hare's-foot, whose duty it was to touch the honest cheeks of Kitty Clive with stage-rouge. "I suppose you think yourself somebody ?" said the hare's-foot. "Pretty conceit, indeed !"

As I felt myself no match for the speaker, I meekly replied that I had no intention of offending anybody by unseemly affectation ; but that I hoped some indulgence might be granted me as a young beginner ; the more especially, after the exciting events of the night. It was impossible, I humbly submitted, to receive so much applause, and not be a little moved.

"It's like the whole tribe of ye," cried the hare's-foot with a sneering laugh. "Applause to you ! Where would the applause have been but for me ? Why, Kitty Clive would have looked a ghost, a spectre, a thing out of a shroud, but for my red ! 'Twas I who gave something like youthful blood to her face and sparkle to her eye ; and so have I helped her, year after year. Whilst you—what are you at the best but a supernumerary flourish ; a thing that gives neither fire, nor expression, nor any other quality ? But then, I own it, you are seen ; you are a thing waving in the eyes of the world ; and though, in my opinion, not worth a groat, you are gaped at and bepraised ; whilst I, who give good gifts in secret, I am unthought of or despised."

Spite of my vanity, my conscience told me there was some truth in this. Hence, addressing the hare's-foot in the mildest manner, I begged to know if it had been long in the profession ?

"I have painted everything," replied the hare's-foot, "from Juliets down to the old women. Ha ! no doubt you have sighed for the freedom of your African wilderness ; you have yearned"—

"Yes," I answered hastily, "but never less than now. This life appears to me delicious. Indeed, I know no condition so blissful."

"Poor wretch !" cried the hare's-foot with a contemptuous groan. "Shall I ever forget the sweetness of my liberty ? The fresh perfumed dew that bathed my infant paws ? My adult gambols by moonlight ? The sweet spring-grass and beds of thyme, and sweeter felony committed upon early peas in kitchen-garden ? Nights of my youth ! Fragrant and nimble was the air around me, and freshness was in all my steps ! Then was I guileless even to simplicity. I was slain, and from that hour I have been made an instrument of deception. Oh, the false paintings I have done ! Oh, the cracked and faded human canvas I have daubed and daubed, and passed upon men for heaven's painting !"

There was an earnestness in these words that interested me. "How were you killed," I asked ; "according to act of parliament, or"—

"No," cried the hare's-foot with much satisfaction, "I was not coursed, and worried, and torn to pieces according to the statute. No ; I thank my stars, I was humanely poached. There might have been, in my case, more honour in dying by the laws of my country ; but as far as I can conceive of the matter, snaring must be much less painful. Nevertheless," said the hare's-foot with a sudden touch of melancholy, "all my career has been mean and miserable. Would you think it? I was even cooked without gravy, and dished without currant-jelly."

An exclamation of sympathy escaped me.

"You have heard," continued the hare's-foot, "that I was poached? I believe I owed my death to an unsophisticated love of the English drama. Yes; Hodge Peastraw, lacking the price of admission to the barn of Biggleton, elevated for a time into a theatrical temple, took me as a mysterious present to Bellowly, the manager. Mr. Bellowly vaunted an everlasting devotion to the laws of his country; nevertheless, Mrs. Bellowly had, at the time, a strange mysterious yearning for hare, and the manager sacrificed the feelings of the patriot to the tenderness of the husband. Hodge gave me—poor poached and slaughtered me!—to Bellowly; and Bellowly, who was that night to play Othello, gave Hodge an order for the show. Hence," added the hare's-foot with a slight laugh, "in the bargain that bartered me, there was murder on both sides."

"So your flesh," said I, "became a dinner to the manager's family, and Peastraw was never suspected?"

"Suspected!" cried the hare's-foot. "Mr. Bellowly took care of that, at the same time doing what was needful for his own dignity. He dropped a large blot of red sealing-wax upon my forehead, then writing an address to 'Achmet Bellowly, Esq., with the Lady of the Manor's admiring compliments,' tied the document to my hind-legs, and caused me to be delivered to him, during rehearsal, in the bosom of his whole company. Nevertheless, I was served up, I may say it, in undress; for the manager could not in private life rise to currant-jelly. I was eaten," said the hare's-foot with a sigh, "I was eaten without the honours."

"And your feet?" I asked.

"My fellow fore-paw was at once consigned to paint the heavy old men, and general utility. Fortune alone can tell what has become of it; but if there be anything in what the players call sympathy, I think it has sunk to the shows, for every year I feel strange low yearnings towards Bartlemy Fair."

"And yourself?" I asked. "What was your career, for you have strangely interested me?"

"You are very kind," answered the foot, in a slightly satirical tone. "I became the property of Mr. Bellowly's little Belvidera. Poor little thing! She was killed for a genius."

The Story of a Feather.

"Pray explain," said I.

"You must know," said the hare's-foot, "that it has been ordered by nature—whether wisely or not I will not answer—that every manager who is a father, has a genius: that is, he possesses a wonderful child, who has been privately suckled by the Tragic Muse, and taught the witching ways of comedy by Thalia. Poor Belvidera was this doomed wonder. Hence, I was set aside to rouge her little baby cheeks; to paint out the fresh hue of childhood—to overlay it with midnight red. Poor waxen puppet! She raved according to rote; she laughed a parrot laugh, she ogled, she simpered; she deformed the frank face of babyhood with the taught tricks of the woman; and grown fools applauded, and wondered, and cried a miracle! The marvel went on; and at length, Mr. Bellowly gave up, as he declared, a very flourishing circuit of barns—for no man more beautifully combined agriculture with the drama—to devote himself wholly to the interest of his darling Belvidera. And the daily wardrobe of Mr. Bellowly increased in lustre; and watch-and-chain, and rings, and other ornaments, which even philosophers, whilst they despise them, wear out of respect to the world, became the property of the devoted father; who, that no spot of the world might be denied the benefit of Belvidera's genius, would condescendingly exhibit it even in way-side inns, at taverns, clubs, in all places, and before all societies. And the poor child was coaxed, and petted, and hot-suppered into a belief of its own greatness, and into the reality of a slow and mortal sickness. I felt its cheek, now hot and clammy, as night after night I was made to lay on more and more paint, and I was assured that the creature was laughing, and dancing, and mumming, every night nearer and nearer to its little grave. And still Mr. Bellowly would, in his blindness, expand his paternal chest, and play with his watch-chain, and pass his ring-encumbered hand athwart his chin, when the meanest and most stolid biped fraction of the world would speak of that 'sweet little dear, his daughter;' to the which praise the manager would merely reply, 'he knew not how it was that Heaven had blessed him, of all men, in that manner; but he was a happy father.'

"Time went on," continued the hare's-foot, "and Belvidera grew worse. The cough—that herald of the church-bell—seized her: nevertheless Mr. Bellowly declared 'twas nothing—merely symptomatic of the measles; and she couldn't have them in a better season. At this time the child played at a country theatre where Mrs. Clive acted. 'What think you, ma'am, of my darling Belvidera?' asked Bellowly. 'I think her,' said Kitty, in her sharp, quiet way—for she cuts as silently as a pick-pocket's knife—'I think her the cleverest corpse I ever thought to see.' 'Heavens! ma'am,' cried Bellowly. 'I tell you, man,' said Kitty, outerying him, 'you'll have that child's blood upon your hands as surely as those rings her blood has bought.'

"Oh, there was a long to-do! At last Mrs. Clive persuaded Bellowly—and, as I think, not without hard money—to take the child, for a time, from the stage. And she had the poor thing up to London, and sent doctors and physicians, and day after day would nurse her herself. But all would not do. The little waxen wonder wasted and wasted, and at length Bellowly, aghast, saw his infant miracle about to die.

"The little creature was meek, affectionate, intelligent. 'I shall die,' she said to Clive; 'I'm sure of it—and oh, it is so strange, I do not seem to fear it. I wish you would let me give you something—it is the only thing that ever was mine. Don't look at it till I'm dead, but pray take it.'

"Clive, with her heart gushing at her eyes, dumb and strangling with emotion, suffered the child to place the gift in her hand.

"The child died. Clive opened the paper, and found the gift to be a hare's-foot—myself."

A Critic's Inkstand. Death of Mrs. Gaptooth.

REMAINED only a few nights in Clive's dressing-room, and was again given to the mistress of the wardrobe. I know not how it was—cannot divine what persuasion was used by Mr. Gauntwolf; but one morning I was consigned by the lady to his care, with strict injunctions of being speedily returned, lest Mr. Garrick should know it; and in a few minutes afterwards found myself in the Rose Tavern—a hostelry much used by actors and their familiar and distant admirers. Here, too, was the small hireling critic, who sugared his ink or added gall to it according to the condensation, flattery, and liquor of the parties to be written up or crushed for ever. Mr. Hugh Kelly was one of these biped insects of the press, and sold what he called fame or destruction to the trembling player. When I entered, I found him listening with an air of contemptuous patronage to the poor actor Davis, who was picking certain cuttings from newspapers—the solace of his life—out of an old leathern pocket-book, and endeavouring to read them to the London critic. These paragraphs were precious extracts from country journals—the St. Kilda's Chronicle, the Penzance Flying Post, the Bullocksmithy Courier—all of which, with twenty others, had declared, in good honest-faced type, that “that spirited actor Davis would inevitably get to the top of the tree;” and very benevolently advising “Mr. Garrick to look to his laurels.” Sweet, passing sweet, to Davis were these promises ! Though he was in the autumn of life—an autumn without fruit—with penury clinging to him like a garment, that flattering type would now and then cast a mild lustre about the past, and he would feel he had not lived in vain. He had been praised, and that was something.

"Gauntwolf, how d'y'e do?" cried Kelly, turning abruptly from Davis. "Your girl played in The Inconstant divinely : looked lovely, too—and so I have said—and in pretty strong terms, I believe. Stop till I've written Mother Clive down, and then"—

"My dear sir," cried Gauntwolf, seizing Kelly's hand, and smiling hideously, "you make me, indeed, a happy father. As for other critics, Mr. Kelly, I value them, say what they will, as so many gnats. But you, sir ! what you say should be written in letters of gold !" Now, as Mr. Kelly was very often fee'd for what he wrote, many of his words may really be said to have been registered in that precious material.

"Yes, yes, I speak out—I give 'em plain English. I'm just finishing here another bunch of nettles for Mother Clive. I'll blister her !" cried the critic, with a look of manly triumph.

"'Pon my word, now," said Gauntwolf, with the compassionate air of a hangman, "you'll kill that poor woman—you will, indeed. I know she hasn't slept since your last attack."

"She shall never sleep again, sir ; never. I have said it ;" and the magnanimous Kelly smote the table with his fist. "Oh, what, you've brought it at last, have ye !" said the critic to the waiter, who appeared with a large replenished inkstand. "Now, remember, sir, that I always have plenty of ink—a sea of it. When a man's thoughts are pouring from him, to be diving and diving for a drop of ink—'tis damnable."

"How you ever get your thoughts down," said the courteous Gauntwolf, "I can't think : they do seem to come upon you in such a flood. Waiter, a glass of brandy. May I be allowed the honour, Mr. Kelly ?"

"Thank ye," responded the critic, "not at present. A little too early," and he addressed himself to his declared task—that of growing nettles upon paper for the doomed Mrs. Clive. In a few minutes Moody of Drury Lane entered. Kelly looked up ; then immediately fixed his eyes upon the paper, Mr. Moody, possibly from a certain roughness of manner that belonged to him, not being among the stage favourites of the critic. Moody bowing recognition to several in the room, walked up to Kelly, and laying his hand upon the critic's shoulder, said, "One word, yes or no." Suddenly Mr. Kelly looked serious. Moody, in the most leisurely manner, took a newspaper from his pocket, and pointing to a paragraph, asked, "Is this your work?"

"I never eat my words," cried Kelly, rising, and assuming a big look; "they are mine."

"A foul, low, personal calumny on Mrs. Clive. Now, Mr. Kelly," and Moody grasped a cane with a significance that attracted Mr. Kelly's eye, "you deny this private slander, or"—

"I beg leave to repeat," cried the critic, beginning to tremble, and his eye still playing about the stick,—"I beg leave to say that I cannot eat my words."

"Very well," answered Moody; "the stars forbid that I should force a gentleman against his taste! But I tell you this, Mr. Kelly," and the actor raised his voice and his stick too,—"if you won't eat your words, you shall drink what your words are written in—before this good company, too—drink it to the health and long life of Mrs. Clive, or there isn't a bone in your skin that sha'n't want a separate surgeon."

"What—what, sir—what do you mean?" stammered Kelly.

"Come, I'll be your cup-bearer, for once," said Moody, presenting the brimming inkstand to Kelly; "you shall empty this—it can't hurt you—for, though it may be poison to the peace of innocent women, you live upon it. Drink!" roared Moody; and striking his cane violently upon the ground, he at the same time forced the inkstand between the fingers of the slanderer.

Mr. Hugh Kelly, who dealt out life and death from his goose-quill—he who could crush any man with the thunder-stroke of his pen—looked appealingly about the room. Many familiar faces were there; but in no one of them did he see the least promise of assistance. On the contrary, there were not a few which indicated a mingled gratification and curiosity. And then the horrible Moody stood and shook his cane. "Drink!" again roared the actor.

"Mr. Moody," said Kelly, "you have injured me by a vile aspersion. You have been pleased to say that I live upon venomous ink. Now, sir, to show to the world, and to confound you with the truth, I will prove that there is no poison in my ink—prove it for my own satisfaction, mind you—by immediately drinking it." Saying this, and shutting his eyes, Kelly emptied the inkstand, filled so lately, by his express order, to the brim. Some of the company laughed, and others cried "bravo!" at the feat. "There," said Kelly, pale in the face and shuddering—"no man, I think, would drink poison in that way."

Moody glanced at the critic with the deepest contempt, and then burst into laughter. "Here," he said to the waiter, at the same time throwing a crown upon the table, "let Mr. Kelly have some brandy to wash his mouth with ; and I hope, after this, he'll keep it the cleaner for the future." Moody then quitted the room ; and Mr. Gauntwolf, possibly not feeling himself in a condition to sympathise with the ink-stained critic, caught me up and hastened to his lodgings. I soon discovered the purpose for which I had been borrowed ; Mr. and Mrs. Gauntwolf had been invited by their dear girl to a "solemn supper," at which "his lordship" had graciously promised to attend. Mr. Gauntwolf, wishing to do all honour to the ceremony, had borrowed me, among other finery, from the theatre for the purpose ; and in due season I was taken to the festival.

The Story of a Feather.

The party was small, but very hilarious. What, however, was my astonishment to find Mrs. Gaptooth of the company ! She evidently felt the honour conferred upon her, for her manners were wonderfully precise and reserved : nor do I think that the Gauntwolves had a full knowledge of the character of the old gentlewoman distinguished by his lordship's friendship. The party, I say, was very merry. Mr. Gauntwolf kissed his dear child again and again ; and as often begged his lordship to take snuff with him, "out of that box, which he should treasure to the last moment of his life." As the wine circulated, Mrs. Gaptooth became thawed, and laughed and talked in such a manner, that more than once Mrs. Gauntwolf, in the startled purity of her soul, wondered "who that woman could be !" When, however, the old woman talked of Fanny Davis, extolling her beauty to the skies, at the same time casting strange looks towards his lordship, Mrs. Gauntwolf was convinced that the creature "was no friend to her dear child !"

And the revelry went on. At length twelve o'clock warned the party of bed time. By this hour Mrs. Gaptooth felt her heart ripened to mellowness with generous wine ; and Mrs. Gauntwolf, not wholly dead to its benevolent influence, thought more charitably of the "merry old lady." A coach was at the door—the Gauntwolves could set Mrs. Gaptooth down—and the party rose for their homes. Mrs. Gaptooth quitted the room for an inner apartment, when—on Bacchus be the mortal blame !—taking the wrong turning, she fell down stairs. A piercing shriek ran through the house ; and few, indeed, were the moments, and the wretched, sinful, dying old woman—for death, indeed, was looking awfully from her eyes—was brought up-stairs and laid upon a couch.

"A doctor—a doctor!"—cried Gauntwolf.

"A parson," groaned the woman, with terrible energy ; "I am dying—I feel it here—I know it. Dying ! That such a wretch as I should ever die ! Send for Mr. Lintley—send for his friend the parson ; be sure, the parson." She then with difficulty gave the apothecary cary's address, and a messenger was hastily despatched to him.

In a brief time, Lintley came, accompanied by Inglewood. At once he perceived there was no hope; the fall had produced a mortal injury of the spine.

"I did not want your assistance but forgiveness," said the woman, "and yours too, sir. God bless you, pray for me," she cried to Inglewood. "You don't know how I worked to destroy that poor child! There were twenty witnesses ready at my hire—but Curlwell would not be the villain to the last—to swear away poor Patty's life—forgive me—beg of her to forgive me!" And with these words the miserable creature died.

I remain in the Family of the Gauntwolfs.

A Letter and a Cheque.

IT may be that the sudden tragedy witnessed by Mr. Gauntwolf made him forgetful of his promise to return me to the mistress of the wardrobe ; it may be that Mrs. Gauntwolf, approving my fitness to her beauty, refused to deliver me up. However it was, I remained some twelve months in the family, and in that time saw the gradual decline of all its glory. Week after week Miss Gauntwolf became more tetchy, pert, and violent.

"My darling lamb—my sweet one—my rose-bud," for with such tender and caressing words was Gauntwolf wont to address his bartered child, "my pearl of light, what ails you?"

"La, father! how can you be such a fool?" cried the dutiful Almeria. "What ails me, indeed!"

"You ought to be as happy as the days are long," exclaimed the father. "And yet for this last week, Almeria, you've been sobbing and pouting like any pauper. For shame! With your comforts about you, too! It's flying in the face of Providence."

"Comforts, indeed! And his lordship going to be married!" cried the girl; and her eyes flashed, and she bit her lips.

Mr. Gauntwolf took his gold snuff-box, the lustrous gift of his lordship, from his pocket, and squeezing together a pinch of snuff with quiet energy 'twixt finger and thumb, and then jerking it up either nostril, said, "Impossible."

"It can't be, Almeria," cried Mrs.

In the Family of the Gauntwolfs.

Gauntwolf. "Going to be married! He couldn't do it."

"His lordship's too much of a gentleman," said Gauntwolf; and his eye slumbered complacently on the gold snuff-box.

"You're both fools together!" exclaimed the young vixen; "blind fools, not to see it."

"Almeria," said Gauntwolf, acting the wounded father, "is this language to me—to your darling mother? Is this our reward?—this the payment for our anxious days, our sleepless nights; this the return for all our tenderness? You, Almeria, have been our idol; the sole object of our every thought; to make your fortune, to see you well in the world, has been our only purpose on this earth, before we went down hand-in-hand into the quiet grave. A thankless child, as King Lear very properly observes, is sharper than a serpent's tooth; I feel it, Almeria—I feel it;" and Mr. Gauntwolf, with a tear glistening in his eye, again took from his lordship's box a consolatory pinch. Mrs. Gauntwolf drew a long sigh, and, with a sympathetic look at her husband, shook her head.

"It's all very fine talk about serpents' teeth," said Miss Gauntwolf; "but I tell you his lordship's going to be married; and just, too, as I was beginning to love him." Here the young lady began to whimper very piteously.

"Now, Almeria, how will you go on so?" cried Mrs. Gauntwolf; "crying for nothing, and making your nose as red as anything? It's only your fond fears; just like your jealousy about Fanny Davis; and what did that end in? His lordship was going to run away with her; at least, so you would have it; and now, the poor little wretch is really married to one of the fiddlers."

"Poor little thing! Yes, really married," said Gauntwolf, again taking snuff. "Ha! she deserved a better fate. But, then, she had no fond father to watch her interests; nobody to put her on in life; for Davis knows nothing of society—poor creature! quite a fool. Whilst you, Almeria—you, who are envied and—"

"What's the use of being envied for a little time, if it's not going to last?" inquired Almeria. "I know his lordship's altered—I'm sure of it. Have I had a letter from him this whole week? He's getting colder and colder, and will bring me to an early grave."

"Colder! You're a fond, foolish girl," said Mr. Gauntwolf. "Didn't I tell you that I met his lordship yesterday; and I'm sure he squeezed my hand—no brother could have been kinder."

All these paternal assurances failed to comfort Almeria ; for she flung herself from the room, muttering something about old fools, and that nobody was so blind as they who wouldn't see.

Miss Gauntwolf being fairly gone, her mother, with an anxious look, observed that after all it was strange, very strange, that his lordship had not called—not so much as written. “Should anything like a marriage happen, that poor girl would break her heart. My dear Abimelech,” said Mrs. Gauntwolf to her husband, “hadn't you better sound his lordship ?”

“There can be no harm in that,” said Gauntwolf, “and now I think of it, I've an excellent way to probe his affections. We want a hundred pounds, Eliza ?”

“Dreadfully,” answered Mrs. Gauntwolf, with great emphasis.

“I'll ask his lordship to lend me the sum,” said Gauntwolf. “If he should refuse, why we shall know what to think of him. Should his lordship mean falsehood to Almeria, he shall find that she has still a father.” Concluding this sentence, Mr. Gauntwolf snatched his snuff-box from his pocket, and, with a determined look, shaking his head very significantly, he took a mighty pinch.

“You've hit upon the very plan, Abimelech,” said Mrs. Gauntwolf ; “and as we can't have the money too soon, and besides, can't know too early what his lordship means towards our dear girl, suppose, like a good creature, you go at once !”

Mr. Gauntwolf, in the pursuit of money, was a man of decision. The fifth minute from this discourse saw him on his way to his lordship's mansion. In less than an hour he had returned to his happy, peaceful hearth, with new gleesomeness in his eyes ; new importance in his manner. His whole anatomy seemed seething in content.

“To be sure. As I have said, received me like a brother. Ha ! this it is to deal with real noblemen.”

“And you've really got the money ?” again asked Mrs. Gauntwolf. “And Almeria—what did his lordship say about our dear girl ?”

“Spoke like a gentleman and a man of honour. Said her happiness was the nearest to his heart ; called her a sweet girl—a good girl ; and said both of us ought to think such a child a treasure. When he said that, I at once asked him for the hundred pounds. Ha ! Eliza, what a fool I was,” said Gauntwolf, and a shadow fell upon his face. “His lordship was so affable, I might have made it two."

A Letter and a Cheque.

"It is a pity," cried the wife. "But where is the money?"

"His lordship will send it—in half-an-hour, he said." A knock at the door attested his lordship's punctuality. A livery servant brought a letter—no answer was required—directed to Mr. Gauntwolf. "Here it is, Eliza; his own gracious hand—his own beautiful seal. Two unicorns, and the Latin Omnia virtute. You don't know what that means, Eliza; it means,"—Gauntwolf had somewhat improved its meaning from his lordship—"it means 'Everybody in the world is done by virtue.'"

"A beautiful sentiment," cried Mrs. Gauntwolf; "but let's see the money."

"Why, you don't suspect it isn't here? No, no; had it been a thousand pounds, his lordship had not refused it. Here it is," cried Gauntwolf, taking a cheque, delicately as it had been a butterfly, from the letter; "here it is: 'Pay to Almeria Gauntwolf or bearer the sum of'—why, no, it isn't—it can't be," exclaimed Gauntwolf with more than player's energy: "and yet it is—'the sum of Two Hundred Pounds.' Two hundred pounds!"

"It can't be," cried Mrs. Gauntwolf, with a hysteric laugh, and snatching the cheque: "it's impossible, and—'Two hundred pounds!'"

"What a man he is to read hearts! His lordship knew I wanted two hundred," said Gauntwolf.

"'Two hundred pounds,'" read Mrs. Gauntwolf, "'value received.' Is that the way they always write cheques?" she asked. "Do they always put 'value received'?"

"Not always," answered Gauntwolf; "but then his lordship's such a man of business."

"But isn't it strange, my love, that his lordship should have written the cheque in the name of Almeria?"

"Not at all; a delicate way of conferring a favour; so like a real nobleman!" cried Gauntwolf. "But here's his lordship's letter; this is to myself, listen. 'Lord —— presents his compliments to Mr. Gauntwolf, and forwards, for the use of his daughter, the inclosed cheque, as a—a—farewell gift.'"

"A what!" screamed Mrs. Gauntwolf.

Gauntwolf, flushed to the eyes, cleared his throat, and after an effort proceeded:—"His lordship leaves England next week, a married man."

"The villain!" exclaimed Mrs. Gauntwolf.

"The heartless, mindless, soulless

The Story of a Feather.

robber!" cried the actor, who snatched the cheque from the hand of his wife, and with a look of vengeance held it extended, a thumb and finger loathingly grasping either end. Thus for a moment stood Gauntwolf. He then exclaimed between his teeth, as though the genius of a better thought had lighted in his brain, "But no!"

"Everybody done by virtue!" cried Mrs. Gauntwolf, with a venomous sneer, as she glanced fiercely at his lordship's motto.

"An insult—a cowardly insult—to a broken-hearted girl," said Gauntwolf.

"And after all," exclaimed his wife, "God knows! they mayn't pay the cheque."

Woman—bless her! a thousand and a thousand times softens the ruggedness of fortune; nevertheless, thought Gauntwolf, she has now and then a knack of making bad worse, by the force of ill-timed suspicion. At least, such was the infirmity of Mrs. Gauntwolf; who, by this doubt, this last surmised evil—almost unmanned her agitated helpmate.

"In the wide world," exclaimed Gauntwolf, unconsciously adopting the worst language of the playhouse, "there cannot be so vile a wretch! Not pay the cheque! Perhaps, ordered not to pay it! To sport with the heart-strings of an innocent child! But his lordship—aye, and were he ten times a lord—shall find that his victim, his artless victim, has a father." Here Mr. Gauntwolf again applied for consolation to the gold snuff-box.

At this moment, Miss Gauntwolf, alarmed by the vehemence of her parent, entered the room. What could be the matter? Whereupon Mr. Gauntwolf, for the time suppressing the letter, assured Almeria that it was nothing; he was merely talking with her mother about his lordship's cheque. "And here," said Mr. Gauntwolf, "here it is; look. 'Pay to Almeria Gauntwolf or bearer the sum of two hundred pounds,'"—

Almeria took the document from her father's hand, and almost unconsciously concluded the sentence—"Value received."

Gauntwolf falls Sick.
His Grief and his Gold Snuff-box.

MR. GAUNTWOLF lost no time in hurrying to the banker's. It was all right ; the cheque was paid ; and the anxious father, somewhat relieved and soothed by the circumstance, returned to his home, as he expressed himself to his wife, "with a load off his heart." Leaving to the partner of his bosom the painful and delicate task—she could do it much better than he could—of communicating his lordship's treason to Almeria, Mr. Gauntwolf again sallied forth.

I will not dwell upon the misery of Almeria ; if her grief was painful, it was happily very brief, for in less than a week, solaced and uplifted by the philosophy of her mother, she followed her advice, which was to "wipe his lordship clean from her heart, like a milk-score from a door-post." And then, there were the two hundred pounds which, for a time, gave a sweet oblivion to all care ! Mrs. Gauntwolf blazed in new gowns ; Mr. Gauntwolf became the wit and idol of a tavern set, merely by virtue of paying their score ; whilst the thought of some new conquest that should prove to his lordship how very contemptible a person he was to her, imparted even a skittish vivacity to the deserted Almeria.

Sweet, however, as are two hundred pounds, they carry with them this alloy—they will not give delights and last. In some three months—for Mr. Gauntwolf had in the handsomest manner discharged a few debts which had become very pressing—scarcely a shilling of his lordship's farewell donation remained unspent. Another loss—severe, irreparable—fell upon the hapless Gauntwolf. I have before related that, as an actor, his deep, blatant voice, was his chief excellence. Nature had marked and fitted him up for at least a stage-ruffian. His lungs were his fortune. What, then, will be felt by the reader, doubtless much interested in the destinies of Gauntwolf, when he is informed that the actor—stricken by sudden cold, when jocundly emerging from a tavern—became dead hoarse? “Hush’d was Apollo’s lute.” For some time, the calamity was considered but as a passing evil: rum and butter, or twenty other specifics—which Gauntwolf had successfully tried as many times—would bring back the treasured music to the organ. Reader, that music was gone—extinct as a dead nightingale. Gauntwolf, who once spoke like a Philistine trumpet, had not voice enough where-with to rouse a mouse. Even Mrs. Gauntwolf had to incline her ear to catch the reedy sounds of her afflicted mate. After a few weeks, Gauntwolf, being found mere lumber in the theatre, was discharged. His voice had kept him in his situation—he was so useful in the thieves and murderers; but that gone, his character in no way addressed itself to managerial sympathies. Besides, it so happened that when Gauntwolf was found to be vocally useless, he was discovered to be shamefully immoral: hence, his discharge—at least in the opinion of the management—threw a sort of lustre on the authority that banished him.

And now poverty, with every day a sterner, ghastlier look, became the inmate of the house of Gauntwolf. It was hardly to be hoped that his daughter, taught as she had been, would remain in so cold and dreary a mansion, and with her slender salary, bestow a passing comfort on such household misery. No; she left her parents and, in her own words, took care of herself. She was too young to be moped up; it would be time enough for her to know trouble when she grew older. She left her father in suffering and destitution; and he—poor wretch!—marvelled at her ingratitude, seeing, as he said, what he had done for her!

Daily meals still took away some article of dress—some little piece of plate; and now a brooch—and now a ring bought breakfast and dinner. With every sacrifice, Gauntwolf's temper became sourer and more violent. Then would he strive to rave and roar at his wife, but his voice sounded like wind through a crevice, and his blasphemies were scarcely audible, though his features were often blackened and convulsed with rage. His wife would at times sit in most malicious tranquillity, eyeing her gasping mate with scorn and contumely. "Why don't you speak out?" she has said, in her most sneering moods, "why don't you speak out, and then I should hear you?" And then Gauntwolf, panting and foaming with passion, has shaken his fists in the woman's face, who has laughed the more provokingly. These were fits of passion. There were times when husband and wife exchanged sympathy and tenderness, mutually bemoaning their fortune—mutually lamenting their undutiful daughter. And then, with more than usual pathos, would Gauntwolf take snuff from the gold box, and cry—"And after all I have done for her!"

The Story of a Feather.

Throughout the domestic wreck Gauntwolf had clung to that gold box with the tenacity of dying vanity. Twenty times had his wife begged that she might carry that valuable to the pawnbroker; no, anything but that; he would want bread—he would perish first. Then, in maudlin voice he would cry he could not help it. Almeria had been an undutiful child; it was true—an unfeeling child; and yet that snuff-box seemed still to link her to his heart; yes, and he would lose his heart-strings ere he would part with it. And so, every day some household article, some piece of dress was pawned, Gauntwolf seeking consolation with snuff from the gold box—the gift of his lordship—the gold box with the beautiful Venus on the lid—the gold box that always brought back thoughts of his undutiful daughter. Hence, Gauntwolf was resolute: he would sit with hunger at his vitals—with desolation around him—but he would hold to the death the gold box!

Speedily sickness fell upon Gauntwolf. In a fortnight from the first attack, he lay in utter helplessness, with poverty, destitution at his bed-side. A little money was raised at the theatre; for Mrs. Clive, on hearing the wretched man's condition, headed the subscription list, and carried it round the green-room. This help somewhat smoothed the sick man's pillow; but the disease grew, and the money ebbed and ebbed, and again Gauntwolf was penniless.

"Now, my dear, my love—let me, do let me take that box," cried the wife, with her ear close to the sick man's lips.

"I won't—I can't—I'll suffer anything first," said Gauntwolf, in a gasping whisper.

"It's not like selling it; we can get it again, Abimelech; to be sure we can, when you are well, and your voice comes back; and doesn't the doctor say that this very sickness may be the means of bringing it back again? Do let me take the box," and the wife was sliding her hand under the pillow.

"Leave it alone!" cried Gauntwolf; and with sudden might he rose in the bed, and looked rage and defiance at his wife. "It's like tearing my life away to part with it. Never—never—while I live, never! My poor child—my naughty child,—yet, it's all I have to remember her." In this manner did the wretched man, dupe to himself, confound the recollection of his daughter with the golden payment of the infamy he, her father, had brought upon her.

Gauntwolf falls Sick.

Gauntwolf became worse—delirious : his wants increased—there was neither food nor firing in the house ; and whilst he slept, his wife drew from beneath his pillow the contested snuff-box, which the pawnbroker changed into money. Ten guineas did Mrs. Gauntwolf carry from the money-lender ; ten guineas, which, she declared to her landlady, seemed as if dropt from heaven ! Ere she returned home she had taken the precaution of buying a bright brass box which—filled with snuff—she placed beneath Gauntwolf's pillow. He was too ill—too light-headed, she said, to know the difference, and as he got well, she could break the matter to him. She felt—as she avowed to her landlady—that it was a dreadful sacrifice for him ; he had such pride, such manly pride ; and then he so loved that box for the sake of his daughter. Nevertheless, could she as a wife stand there and see him die for medicine, with that gold snuff-box under his pillow ? It could have been nothing but Providence that made them keep that gold box for such a time ! What should they have done without that gold box ?

Time brought healing on its wings ; Gauntwolf's fever subsided, but left him worn, spent, *emaciated. For a week he had taken no snuff. At length, he whispered—looking with a quickened look at his wife—"My box—where is my box ?"

"Under your pillow—you'll find a box, love—yes, under your pillow," said the wife coaxingly.

The sick man searched, and whilst his wife shrunk from the bed-side he drew forth the brass counterfeit. In a moment he saw the truth ; in a moment seemed to know and acknowledge the necessity that had made the change. Hence, with a tear trickling down his nose, he resignedly tapped the lid, lifted it, took a pinch of snuff, and said, turning the box in his hand, "Brass ! God bless me ! this is indeed a trial." Mrs. Gauntwolf, affected by the resignation of, as she called him, her suffering martyr, rushed from the room, and in glowing words narrated the scene to her landlady. "When the dear soul saw it was brass, bless him, he took it like an angel." Whereupon the landlady assured Mrs. Gauntwolf that such obedience to the will of the Lord would be sure to meet with blessings. For herself she had no doubt of it, Mr. Gauntwolf would get his beautiful, manly voice once more ; and she should see him in Richard, go to murder the young princes once again !

"Vain human hopes—fond, empty aspirations ! Gauntwolf recovered his health ; but his voice remained dead and buried in his throat. Strong he was, and could have done porter's work ; but, as he lamented, he had been born and bred a gentleman—for this, be it remembered, I have only Gauntwolf's unsupported word—and how could he labour like a common fellow ? How he lived from month to month,—Heaven, that has charge of the destitute, alone knew how. And then the frequent memento of his present wretchedness—that brass snuff-box ! Oh, it would wear his heart, the more especially if softened by a gratuitous glass of spirits or a mug of ale ! “That it should come to this !” he would say, in melancholy musing, feeding his nose—“That it should come to this ! Brass ! Gracious Heaven—brass !”

I am Pawned, and again Sold to Shadrach Jacobs.

TIME passed, and the fortunes of Gauntwolf still remained desperate.

His voice returned not, and the intemperance which, at others' cost, he sometimes indulged in, brutalised his temper, and by degrees gave him the countenance of a savage. Then would he wreak his worst wishes on his daughter, who, as he declared, all forgetful of his tenderness, had deserted the best of fathers in his sorrow and destitution, and whilst she herself revelled in the luxuries of the world—for Almeria had been beguiled from the theatre, and lived a life of miserable, guilty splendour—suffered the kindest, most indulgent of parents to wither on a crust. Poor wretch! and so he wasted, his gray hairs being to him as a crown of penal fire. (He died, as I afterwards learned, in misery, and his child indignantly refused to look upon her father's corpse.)

Piece by piece each article was pawned. How it was that I remained so long in the possession of Mrs. Gauntwolf, I will explain. Again and again, when making up a parcel for the money-lender, did she take me between her fingers, ponder awhile, then lay me down again. "No," she has said to herself, "I'll live in hope; better times must come; and if they don't, why it sha'n't go till the last, I'm determined." She could not give up the fond, the flattering thought, that at some early day she should be called, as she expressed it, into the world again, and therefore hoarded me, even with superstitious care, that I might grace her reappearance on the stage of life. "Besides," she has sometimes added, "they'd lend me nothing on it after all." The time, however, came when our separation could no longer be put off. Hence I was one day taken to the pawnbroker. Yes; poor Mrs. Gauntwolf looked at me with moistened eyes; sighed very heavily; then carefully laying me in a piece of folded paper, carried me away to the money-lender, who, with the brevity of his trade, asked, "How much?"

The Story of a Feather.

"You must let me have a crown, indeed, you must," said Mrs. Gauntwolf, trying to smile through all her heaviness of heart.

The pawnbroker flung me contemptuously back, saying, "Eighteenpence."

"Now, really, I've been a good customer," said Mrs. Gauntwolf, "and I happen to want the exact crown. My dear sir"—

"Eighteenpence," repeated the pawnbroker.

"Now, really"—

"Don't waste my time. Eighteenpence." The money-broker was inexorable.

"I must take it," said Mrs. Gauntwolf, with a sigh: the money was paid, and in the evening I was deposited in the pawnbroker's store-room, where I remained undisturbed for upwards of a twelvemonth. Then I was sold with other unredeemed goods, and once more passed into the hands of Shadrach Jacobs, my old master, of the Minories; that thrifty Hebrew always attending the sale of pawnbrokers' effects, to buy thereat his profitable penn'orths. How my heart sank within me as the old Jew turned me over and over! What scenes had I mingled in since he last took me between his fingers! And had I been dressed, prepared for a Prince of Wales, only at length to be returned to the miserly Jew, my first London purchaser? Alas! I knew not then what further misery awaited me.

When Shadrach Jacobs carried me to his den in the Minories, I no longer found there the plump and languishing Miriam. "She'll die in a ditch vid de Christian dog she's married—she vill, she vill," cried Shadrach to a friend and fellow-tradesman, Moses Moss, who called upon him very shortly after my arrival at the Jew's house. "Ha, Moses, my tear friend, it's unknown what she robbed me on; if I hadn't been her father, I'd a hanged her; but I couldn't do it—I couldn't do it." And so the old man lived alone, hoarding, hoarding; hunting bargains hour by hour—accumulating wealth for no end. His daughter had forgotten the faith of her fathers, and married a Christian butcher. Old Shadrach was a childless, miserable, wealthy man. Every day he became more and more enfeebled, and all his money could not buy him one touch of sympathy in his downward path; and so, unregarded, he travelled with disease upon him to the grave. In three months after he became my purchaser, Shadrach died. Who inherited his wealth I know not. What I know is this; his stock and household goods were sold, and I was bought by Shadrach's late friend, Moses Moss, who had me cleaned, and shortly afterwards sold me to a furnishing undertaker. In brief time I was promoted to the plume, and solemnly borne on a lid before the hearse.

I will not dwell upon my experience in this my new and most melancholy condition. Not that I should need matter wherewith to chequer scenes of funereal woe. The lively and humorous discourse of those chamberlains of death, the undertaker's men, who—the funeral over—make so very merry at the public-house, and are so extremely jocose on the top of the hearse, would afford me very pleasant and mirthful memories. All these, however, I shall pass, dwelling only upon one incident of my funereal life.

Has the reader forgotten Jessy—the miserable, blighted, yet warm-hearted girl, who in her passion of remorse besought the prayers and forgiveness of Patty Butler? She died in peace and penitence, though it is not of her funeral I have now to speak.

One Sunday I had been upon duty, carried before the hearse, at the funeral of a man, a bachelor, who died an early death. He was buried in a suburban church-yard, where at least the grass could grow about the graves, and was not blighted, stifled by London soot. He was not laid in a London charnel-house, where London life in all its noise and activity roars and bustles around the sanctuary of death. No; he was buried in a quiet, sequestered spot; and the funeral over, the undertakers hurried with the hearse to the door of the Silver Lion, where they “undressed” the vehicle of all its mournful appointments. An elderly woman, in decent black, had followed the procession from the house to the grave-yard. It was a sultry day, and her walk had been a long one: the woman paused at the door of the inn, and asked for a glass of ale. She then seated herself on a bench at the door, and in a few minutes was in conversation with the mistress of the inn, who, having brought the ale, still lingered gossiping in the sunshine ; the while the undertaker's men drew me with my companions from the hearse, and deposited us in a bag.

"You've had a long walk, eh, mistress?" said she of the Silver Lion.

"Yes, ma'am, long enough," said the woman. "But had the way been twice as long, I must have come."

"Ha ! you knew the poor man that's buried?"

"I can hardly say I knew him, and yet there was something so sweet in his manner—something so sorrowful in his story, that, though I never spoke twenty words to him, made me quite love him. Ha, ma'am," cried the woman, "folks may laugh and jeer as they will, but men do die of broken hearts, be sure of it."

"And did he die so?" asked the landlady, immediately interested in the fate of the departed.

"Ay, indeed, he did. I'll tell you the story. You see, ma'am, I'm one of the pew-openers at the Magdalen—you've heard of the Magdalen, ma'am?"

"To be sure I have," answered the landlady, a little coldly, "and what of the Magdalen?"

"Well, ma'am, the poor young man that's buried had been to sea, far away in foreign parts, and came home with money for life. Before he went away he was plighted to a girl, and now he was come back, and was going down the next morning to his native place to see her. In the evening he came to our church. Shall I ever forget his healthy, happy face, when I showed him to a seat? Yet, when the service was over, he seemed troubled in his looks ; there was a sort of cloud upon him. Well, ma'am, a month after that he came back ; and then was his face as fixed and white as any stone."

"He had lost his sweetheart, I suppose?" said the landlady. "Married somebody else, no doubt?"

"Worse than that, ma'am. Some time after he had gone to sea, she became flighty and foolish, and the end of it was, she left her home and led a life of sin. Poor soul ! she repented, if ever poor mistaken soul repented ; but she was not to remain in this world. When she came to the Magdalen, she was fast gone into a consumption. Yet she would sing so beautifully ! Oh, you could hear her voice so sweet, and so pure above all the others ! Well, ma'am, as it afterwards turned out, she sang, and for the last time at church, on the very night that her sweetheart first came there. It was her voice—though he couldn't believe it hers—that had so troubled him. However, he went home, and learned all his misery—she who should have been his wife was a penitent sinner in the Magdalen."

I become the Property of an Undertaker.

"Dear heart!" cried the landlady.

"As I say, ma'am, he came back, but Jessy—for that was her name—was dead. So to speak, he had heard her dying voice; she never sang after that night."

"Poor soul!" said the landlady. "And did he come after that to the church?"

"Never missed a day, ma'am," said the pew-opener. "But every time looked paler and paler, and thinner and thinner. Poor soul! When the women sang the hymns I've seen the tears sometimes come into his eyes, as if he heard her voice again, and he would sigh so it would have melted a heart of stone to hear him."

"How very odd!" cried the landlady. "I never thought to hear such a thing of a man; with us, to be sure, broken hearts are common enough. But a man—well, I never!"

"Oh, anybody could see his was breaking. Last Sunday week only, he came to church; for many Sundays I never expected to see him again—but still, though weaker and weaker, he was there; and still he smiled so gently, so patiently, and to the last seemed so comforted with the singing! Ha, ma'am," cried the pew-opener, "if there ever was such a thing as a broken heart, there's one in his coffin."

And such was the end—the happy end—of Jessy, for she died in peace and in purity of spirit. Such the closing hour of him who should have been her husband. Her voice seemed to have left its dying echoes in the church, and still the wasting, broken-hearted man would smile as fancy listened to them.

I Leave the Undertaker, and am Promoted to a Monkey's Cap.

HAPPILY, I was not fated to remain long in the service of the undertaker ; although, indeed, my release from him was purchased at a considerable sacrifice. One day, the undertaker's men having possibly been more than usually impressed with the solemnity of their calling, required more than their usual quantity of alcohol to give a fillip to their cast-down spirits. In a word, they lingered so long at the public-house, that one and all of them became, in the most intense meaning of the word, drunk. They brawled, scuffled, and fought ; and in the confusion, a lighted candle falling on the bag in which myself and comrades were, after the ceremony of interment, ordinarily deposited, the flame in an instant singed me from top to toe. It was impossible that I could be taken back to my owner in my burnt condition, and therefore, in the most liberal spirit, peace being somewhat restored, I was given to the bar-maid,—who the next week presented me to a damsel, who for three nights became the tenant of the back attic of the Hare and Hounds, the while the fair was held in the village. This maiden was the columbine of the first booth ; but I was even too much disfigured to appear in the front of a show, and was therefore given, I presume, as a sort of gage d'amour, to a Mr. Bunkle, the proprietor of a dromedary and a monkey. In a trice, I was placed as an ornament in the monkey's cap ; and my wearer being perched upon the dromedary's back, I was enabled to consider out-door life from a very advantageous eminence. As the monkey twitched his cap on and off at the command of his master, and so rumpled me sadly, it is true I felt an occasional twinge at the indignity; that I, who had commenced life as one of the plumes of a Prince of Wales, should end in a monkey's bonnet, becoming the beggar of halfpenny pieces! Such were now and then my thoughts, but I warded them off with a gay philosophy that said—"Pooh, pooh, let's jog on, and be merry."

However, my situation had this advantage. As I was carried to all parts of London, and travelled many portions of the country, I learned the history of several of my old acquaintances. It is true I learned it by snatches, but yet sufficiently well to piece out a history. Hence, one day while my master was exhibiting his wonders—the dromedary and myself—at Tyburn Turnpike, I beheld among the crowd, leaning on the arm of a stalwart-looking tradesman, dear Mrs. Cramp, the card-maker's widow. But there was such happiness in her face—such heartiness in her laughter as my wearer, the monkey, approached and doffed his bonnet to her, that I was convinced her shattered heart had been newly cemented by a second marriage. Her face seemed shining in the serene light of a honeymoon. It is true, she stood upon the death-place of Abram Clickly—for, alas! the highwayman was really hanged,—nevertheless, it was plain she was not haunted by the remembrance of that untoward event. Yes—there was no doubt of the fact—she was married. The tone in which I heard her say, "Come, love, or Becky will scold us for spoiling dinner," rang with wedded bliss. And Becky—the faithful, sympathising Becky—still kept her place, and doubtless still guarded the secrets of her mistress.

It was on one of these pilgrimages, that my owner—as usual seeking the hospitality of a stable for my wearer and the bigger beast—put up at the Crown at ——. What was my astonishment, shall I say, too, my delight—to find that albeit the hostelry bore the name of Julius Curlwell, it was Curlwell's wife who ruled the house, and more especially ruled the individual master thereof? And who, think ye, reader, was Mrs. Curlwell? No other than the former Mrs. Pillow, house-keeper to the Earl of Blushrose. Every movement of her tongue seemed to blister the hapless Julius; he winced and trembled, yet answered not. When my master, with a bland politeness that really exalted his calling, asked Mr. Curlwell to grant the shelter of his stable at the lowest possible price, Curlwell replied not, but looked appealingly to his wife; whereupon, Mrs. Curlwell exclaimed, "Beasts! I'll have no more beasts than the law compels me to have in my place. Hav'n't I beast enough in you, you lazy animal?"—she exclaimed to Julius, who had not the courage to venture dissent. Sweet, most sweet to me, was it to know that Julius Curlwell, the plague and persecutor of Fanny Butler, was sentenced for life to the excoiating voice of a painted shrew—for her cheeks were red as ruddle—together with an occasional visitation from rolling-pin or candlestick. Hymen had terribly avenged the wrongs of the feather-dresser.

Repulsed from the Crown, the showman wandered to a village—the village of Mannasfield—some three miles off. Here we exhibited, evidently to the very great admiration of the rustic natives and to the especial delight of their children. It was plain that we had fame enough among them; but equally plain that we had no halfpence. My master had a touch of the philosopher and the philanthropist in his composition; nevertheless, he could not, as he said, "keep his beasts for nothing," and was therefore about to leave Mannasfield with some disgust at the little tangible patronage he had received from its inhabitants, when an incident occurred that altogether mollified him, sending him in good humour to an opposite ale-house.

The dromedary was showing his paces, and the monkey in his most winning way holding his cap to the crowd that laughed loudly at his antic politeness, yet nevertheless dropt no copper to him,—when a lady stept from a cottage. The monkey—well-educated beggar!—immediately approached her, and held forth his cap with most beseeching air. The lady—there seemed to me a sweet benignity in her eyes, though her face was stained and disfigured by disease—smiled, and then—I knew not how it was—I felt certain that I had seen her somewhere before, though where I could not well remember. Looking graciously, pityingly at the poor monkey, she dropt a shilling in his cap, and with a new smile passed on.

"Well, that's what I call a lady—a real lady down to the stockings," said my master.

"You may say a lady," chimed in the master of the ale-house, who was sunning himself in his door-way, and gratuitously enjoying the performances of the beasts. "You may say a lady."

"Lives hereabout, I suppose?" said my master.

"WELL, THAT'S WHAT I CALL A LADY!"—

I am Promoted to a Monkey's Cap.

"Up at the great house," said the landlord.

"Give us a mug of ale, and I'll drink her health, and wish there was more like her," cried my master, dropping himself on a bench, that he might at leisure enjoy his tipples.

"That's a angel, turned to a woman," said the tapster, bringing the ale ; "and more than that, she's a real Countess—mayhap you've heard of her, for she made a great noise once in London—she's the Countess Blushrose. She was the beauty of six counties once."

"I can't say much for her beauty," answered my master, "but a shilling was like a lady."

"Ha !" said the publican, "she was beautiful, I can tell you ; but the droll thing is, when she was in the full blow of her beauty nobody could abear her. Her husband and she, like poker and tongs, was always on opposite sides. You see, she thought all the world was in her beautiful face, and nothing whatsoever out of it. Then, she'd as soon agone into a pig-stye with silk stockings on as walked into the cottage of a poor man ; now, bless your heart ! she's all the contrary."

"That's droll enough," said my master ; "and how was it brought about ?"

"You see, one night, when she was in all the glory of her beautiful face, over-dancing or something of that sort—she caught the—the—I don't know why they give sickness such hard names, unless it be to frighten it—the erisy-puluss."

"Sipelass," said the landlord's wife in correction, the two eking out the proper word.

"That's it," said the landlord ; "well, that it seems was enough ; there was no more beauty—that was gone for life. When they first showed her a looking-glass, they say she doubled up her little white fist and smashed it into a thousand pieces. And then she wept and tore her hair, and all that. At last, she listened to reason. She give up London, and all its routs and balls ; come down here—from the first moment went among the poor,—and now she nurses 'em and talks to 'em just as if they was like her own flesh and blood. Now, she never stirs that she doesn't walk out like in a very shower of blessings."

Such was the benignity—such the benevolence of the Countess Blushrose.

XLIV

I again Meet with Patty Butler. Her Marriage. Conclusion.

My story now approaches the end. My master continued to travel from place to place, and at length one day arrived at Man-trap Park, the abode of the two Miss Pea-chicks—the lodgers of Flamingo—the visitors to Newgate—the simple, sympathising creatures who, touched by the early sorrows, the sweet patience of Patty Butler, had carried her away with them from London ; and in the solitude and calmness of the country, had tended and comforted her. How they loved her ! How they lavished daily, hourly tenderness upon her ! Excellent women—twin sisters of benevolence ! Creatures preserved from all the hurry, all the sordid coarseness of life, to be the simple almoners of human kindness.

It was not until after the accident that released me from the bonnet of the monkey, that I learned the good fortune of Patty. I have, however, set it down in this place, that I might as early as possible please the reader with the news of Patty's happiness.

My master, with his treasured beasts, approached the house ; and in a moment were at the window the smiling, good-natured faces of the owners of the mansion. A moment afterwards appeared Patty. Bless her ! how happy she seemed ! What a thing of innocence and tranquil joy ! Country air and a quiet spirit had imparted to Patty's looks a freshness and beauty that surprised me. Even in her worst misery, with all daily wants besetting her, there was about her an air of refinement—a quiet dignity that marked her as one of nature's gentlewomen ; but now there was a simple elegance in her manner, an elevated cheerfulness of look, that showed she dwelt amid ministering comforts—that proved the love, the watchful benevolence of all about her.

With these thoughts I continued to gaze at Patty, when the monkey approached the window. For a moment I thought of the poor orphan feather-dresser, in that garret of death, with want and worst temptation around her ; and I felt an inexpressible warmth and glow of heart, to behold the noble-hearted girl snatched from the weariness and violence of a rough world, and treasured as she was, a thing of purity and meekness. Such were my thoughts, as the monkey—drawing near to the window—extended his paw for a piece of cake which Patty held towards him. The next moment, and a huge dog, Dragon, the pet of the Miss Peachicks, rushed I know not whence upon the monkey, seizing the creature in his jaws. The Peachicks screamed—Patty turned pale—my master swore—the servants ran from the house, and in a trice the terrified monkey was carried into the parlour. Happily, the animal had suffered nothing but fright from the jaws of Dragon ; and my master, as he allowed, more than recompensed for any anxiety he might have suffered on account of poor pug, went his way. A fortunate accident, however, allowed me to remain in the house. In the confusion I had fallen from the monkey's cap, and lay unseen on the carpet beneath the table. Indeed, I was scarcely the shred of my former self, and could be easily overlooked. Truly, there was a time when my waving whiteness caught all eyes ; but now I was a poor discoloured, diminished thing—the very rag of a feather. Hence, for a whole day I remained unseen ; and when I was at length discovered, I was carried into the kitchen, where I remained long enough to learn the happiness of Patty.

Immediately after the trial, Patty had been carried to Man-trap Park, the Miss Peachicks declaring that from that moment they adopted her as a younger sister—certainly, a much younger sister. And Patty was happy? No—not happy ; she poured forth prayers of gratitude for her deliverance ; and her heart grew too big for words as the kind old gentlewomen, in the very excess of sympathy and compassion, strove to make amends for the past buffetings of fortune. Nevertheless, her heart was no longer single : it was—even ere she well knew it—wedded to Inglewood ; and disease, a slow yet certain disease, was wasting him. He seemed doomed, inexorably doomed, by that subtle tyrant consumption. "His only hope," said Lintley, "is in a speedy removal to a warm climate. Then, perhaps, could he remain some two or three years, why—perhaps,"—and still the doctor hesitated; he could give no strong assurance even of the benefit of that last hope. He, however, strove to compass it. Without breathing a word to Inglewood, Lintley sought Earl

Blushrose; simply told the story of his lordship's late chaplain; and the Earl, glad to remember and acknowledge the humanity of Inglewood, who—I hope the reader has not forgotten the circumstance—had at some peril saved the life of his lordship's brother, immediately promised the means required ; and, briefly, Inglewood, without an unnecessary hour's delay, was to take ship for Madeira.

Solemn, yet hopeful, was the parting of Inglewood and Patty. They were already wedded in heart ; and troubled, yet with sweet assurance of a future meeting, the lovers separated. Every month brought better news from the reviving man—every month saw new cheerfulness in Patty's eyes ; and when I became an inmate of the Miss Peachicks' mansion, a letter was every day expected from Inglewood, announcing his arrival in England.

"It is from Inglewood," said Miss Leonora Peachick, as at length the postman knocked.

"Then he's arrived of course?" said Miss Amelia.

"No doubt of it," cried Leonora.

A few moments, and Patty, her eyes swimming with tears, placed the opened letter in the hands of the eldest lady.

"I knew it was from Inglewood," she cried, and how she trembled as she read :—

"PORTSMOUTH, —.

"Another day, my beloved Patty, and I shall be at your side. Travel has awarded me the wished-for blessing, health ; a blessing still to be crowned by your love.

"To the dear friends whose quick sympathies acknowledged your innocence—who have protected, sheltered ye—"

"There, never mind all about that ; read the next," said the younger Miss Peachick, and her sister obeyed.

"To-morrow I return. The Earl has added to the obligation which enabled me to travel, the means of competence ; a small but sufficient curacy in your neighbourhood. To-morrow, and I claim a wife.

"Thine, with deepest love,
"ROBERT INGLEWOOD."

"You shall be married the day after," said the elder Miss Peachick.

"Or if not, the day after that," added the younger.

Inglewood returned, and Patty, in due season, became the curate's wife. Lintley, who had made good advances in the world, attended the solemnity, accompanied by his worthy little sponse : and happy and placid were the after-days rewarding the early trials of the gentle feather-dresser.
